Micro plots Iron Age excavations

By Bill Johnstone Technology Correspondent

A microcomputer program written to help archaeological excavations is being used by its author to plot the progress of complex excavations at an Iron Age farm in Heybridge, Essex, and relocate the positions of any find in seconds.

The program, called Pitcalc, written by a member of the archaeological team, Mr Paul Brown, is for use on a Sinclair Spectrum. It is able totell the precise position of a discovery by using three compass readings taken from the edge of the gravel pit where the dig has taken place.

The program was able toreconstruct the entire archaeological plan of the rescue team last year and determine the position of a digger at the time of a discovery. Gravel contractors working on the site with the archaeological team have limited the time which can be devoted to any discovery, so the relocation program is crucial.

Last year the team took 2,000 photographs on site and filled six site notebooks on the

The British monarch was treated to a rendition more stately than sprightly of her national anthem by the band of the French Foreign Legion; they attacked the more familiar Marseillaise with considerably greater gusto.

Silent army of headstones

The Queen, an excellent French speaker, greeted the President in his native tongue and walked with him down the immaculate green aisle to the tall white cross of sacrifice set in centre of a silent army of grey headstones.

As the strains of the Last Post died on the hot still air, the perfect silence of remembrance descended on the throng, broken only by a songthrush in far tree. Even the infernal clicking of camera shutters was momentarily stilled.

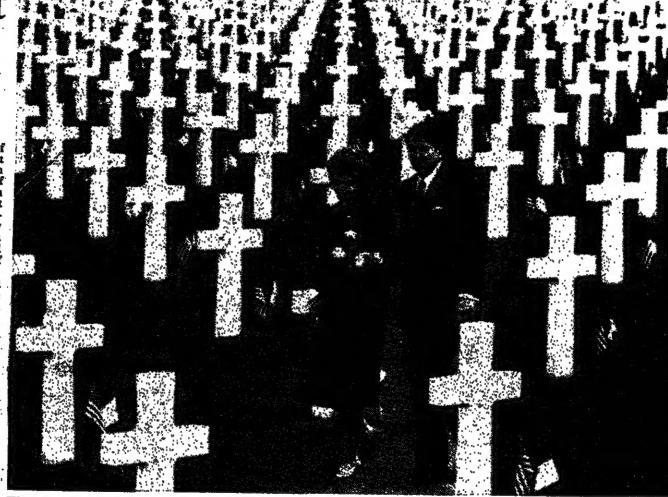

The heads of state and their spouses walked forward together to lay their wreaths at the base of the cross. "Typical" growled a woman in the crowd, noting that the French circle of blood red roses, dressed with a tricolor ribbon, was marginally the larger of the two.

The voice of thousands rose with the words of "O God our help in ages past" and the Chaplain-General of the Armed Forces, Archdeacon William Johnston, prayed for those who still suffered the results of war.

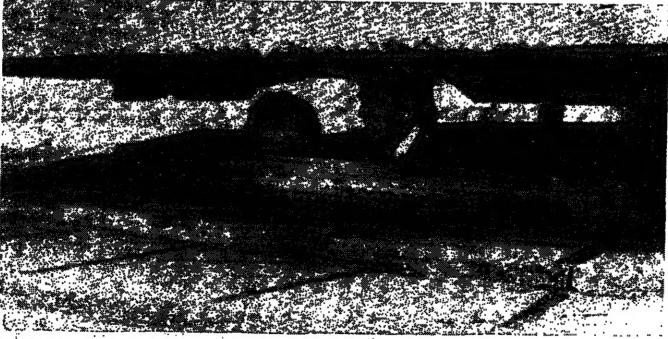

Queen and President walked the long green avenue back to the gate, he chatting constantly and she listening intently, head cocked and nodding. He bade her farewell, then looked around for the Duke, who had been left wrong-footed at the back of the party. He sprang forward grinning broadly and President, who climbed into his Renault for a dash through the country lanes of Normandy to the international ceremony at Utah Beach.

No German underestimates the importance of D-Day in speeding the defeat of Nazi Germany and Hitler's downfall. But many, especially veterans and the older generation, find it more appropriate to commemorate their own opposition to the Nazis rather than defeat on the battlefield.

Speaker clarifies his ruling on 'fascist'

PROCEDURE

Context was all important in judging whether the use of a word was unparliamentary, The Speaker (Mr Bernard Weatherill) stated in the Commons when MPs sought clarification of his ruling on the use of the term "fireter".

context (he said) means how the word is said the circumstances in which it is said, and when it is said. He remained satisfied that the use of the word "faccist" by Dr Maurice Miller (East Kilbride, Lab) during Tuesday's exchanges on Mr P W Botha's visit to Britain had been intended to give offence to an MP and amounted to a reflection on his bonour.

Dr Miller had admitted calling Mr Antony Marlow (Northampton North, C) a fascist, but eventually withdrew the remark.

I would not (The Speaker said) wish there to be any misunderstanding about my ruling. The basic guidance on which the House relies in considering unperliamentary expressions is set out in Erskine moderation are the characteristics of

Mayor in last-ditch request to Karajan

From Michael Binyon

Herr Eberhard Diepgen, the Mayor of West Berlin, is flying to Salzburg this weekend in a last-ditch attempt to bring about a reconciliation between Herbert von Karajan and the Berlin Philharmonic Orches-tra, of which he has been chief conductor for almost 30 years.

The mayor received a telegram from Herr von Karajan on Tuesday, in which the 76-year-old conductor for life drily asked him to define his rights and duties as artistic director, and how these could be reconciled with the orchestra's behaviour over the past two

Herr Volker Hassemer, Herr Volker Hassemer, Berlin's cultural senator, said yesterday he still hoped for reconciliation but the prospects were bleak. There was no chance of Herr von Karajan reconsidering his decision to conduct the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra in Salzburg on June 11, but he was oblige to say how he envisaged his future cooperation with the Berlin Philharmonic.

Herr Hassemer saw the orchestra's letter to its conduc-tor as a last cry for help. He said in an interview that a final break between the 102-year-old orchestra and its fifth, and arguably greatest, conductor would not be a catastrophe, though it would be "extremely unpleasant and a painful loss for Berlin".

The dispute has deeply divided Germany's music critics. Partisans of the conductor and the orchestra's director, Dr Peter Girdh, accuse the players of arrogance. They say it was Herr von Karajan who built them up into one of the world's greatest musical ensembles, and gave a warning yesterday that without him they would relapse into cultural provin-

Romania is willing to accept closer cooperation with Mos-cow, but not structural changes in industry, nor the sacrifice of its ties with the West.

However, both Poland and Romania are united in their need for continued supplies of cheap oil from the Soviet Union, Given its hard currency crisis and its need to relaunch its industry, Warsaw would also like increased quantities. Romania has not been receiving concessionary priced oil from its large neighbour and in general pays in hard currency.

But earlier this year Moscow agreed to supply 1.5 million tonnes of crude in return for Romanian goods in kind and non-convertible cash. This may have helped to ease the tension before the summit.

Poland and Romania have also been showing themselves responsive to some of the louder complaints of the Soviet Union about the quality of goods Comecon countries were selling to Moscow in return for oil and raw materials, A weekend meeting of the Com-munist Party Central Com-mittee criticized the quality of engineering exports - the Engineering Minister was dis-missed shortly before the session - and the Romanian press is full of complaints about the production quality of its export industries.

Marcos puts Manila on alert

Manila (AP) - President Marcos has declared a military alert in Manila and 13 suburban cities and towns, claiming that subversive groups plan "to sow terrorism" in the area.

The opposition questioned the need for military action, noting that it came just before the convening of a new National Assembly where opponents of the President won a significant number of seats An announcement placed constabulary and police units on "red alert" status. Leaves were cancelled and troops told to remain in their camps to forestall efforts of subversive and terrorist groups to destabilize the government. No details were given of the supposed terrorist plot but fires on Monday which razed a suburban public market and an old Manila airport terminal building due for demolition were described as "of suspicious

They contend that it has turned into something like a supra-national tribunal, seeking to impose its own interpretation of national legislation.

The ILO's reply to this, as given by its Director General, Mr Francis Blanchard, is that the committee's essential function is to ascertain the facts without fear or favour, irrespective of governments' susceptibilities.

The conference is also to discuss current efforts, as in West Germany, to reduce working hours in order to create new jobs. Mr Blanchard told a news conference that the 35 hour week was a somewhat debatable concept He regarded legislation for shorter working hours as feasible in conditions of sustained economic growth. In recession, however, this must be a matter for negotiation within individual enterprises, not for acrossthe board regulations.

For the first time a woman has been elected president of the conference - Mrs Anna-Greta Leijon, aged 45, the Swedish Minister of Labour. She told delegates from 150 nations that trade unions were under pressure almost everywhere.

The primary campaign drew to a close yesterday with the Democratic Party exhausted, divided and still without a clear choice of leader behind which it can unite in a crusade to defeat President Reagan in November.

Although the results of the final five primaries left Mr Walter Mondale teetering on the brink of victory, the other two candidates. Senator Gary-Hart and the Rev Jesse Jackson, made it clear that they would not concede defeat and would carry the fight all the way to party's national convention in San Francisco next month.

butter mountain to bring the total weight of this embarrassing surplus to over one million tonnes for the first time.

Despite the cries of anguish from the Community's dairy farmers about the new obligatory reduction quotas, the flood of milk is expensively continuing to exceed anything that can be consumed.
Inside the European Commission the most optimistic estimate is that the mountain may be reduced to 500.000 tonnes over the next two and a half years. That will be possible only if member states are prepared to spend millions of pounds to get rid of it. The money will be available only if the EEC summit at the end of this month agrees to increase Community resources.

Ways of getting rid of the butter have been under consideration for many months. All of the schemes are expensive and none is capable of absorbing all the surplus, even in the

Somewhere in Europe this collapsed and any method of week another unwanted kilog-disposing of it within the ram was added to the EEC Community is not only very expensive but can be counter productive. Despite world star-vation, it is neither practical nor casy to even give the milk products away.

The Commission means to expand its schemes for making cheaper butter available to pastry and ice-cream makers. It is planning to start mass producing shee (a butter oil used in cooking in many third world countries.) for sale to Asia and to the growing ethnic populations in Europe.

The Commission is even looking again in despair at totally uneconomic schemes, like providing cheap butter at Christmas, or offering subsi-dized packets to pensioners and the unemployed. The statistical fact is that this type of scheme has little effect on the size of the mountain.

"It is a myth that the old and the poor switch to margarine because it is cheaper. They always insist on butter," an official said, "It is the rich people like us, who are worried about their weight, who switch to margarine and who won't buy butter at any price."

He said it was far cheaper to destroy the butier than to get rid of it in this way, but this was politically unacceptable. chance sand people drown in Britain every year -nearly a third of the total being males aged 15 to 35. Many are competent swimmers, yet die within 10 yards of a safe refuge, says Surgeon Commander Frank Golden, director of research at the Institute of Naval Medicine, Gosport,

He tested 10 swimmers, capable of swimming fully clothed in warm water for 10 minutes, and put them (still clothed) in water at a temperature of only 5°C, typical inland winter water temperature. Three swam for 10 minutes, but seven foundered at times between two and three heart beats remained normal, but the real difference was in breathing - those who breathed fastest

Jimmy Tontlewicz, aged four, was under ice and water in Lake Michigan for 20 minutes earlier this year. Divers found the child clinically dead. At the hospital his body temperature was found to be under 30°C. The extreme cold had reduced the brain's metabolic rate and need for oxygen, and Jimmy survived the latest in several recorded cases where apparently drowned people have come back to life.

A possible explanation is the mammalian diving reflex which allows seals, whales and other air-breathing aquatic mammals to remain under water for up to 30 minutes. Blood is redistributed from skin, muscles and gut to heart, lungs and brain. But for humans, the likeliest sur-vival occurs when the victims are young and the water icy: at 18°C a body's oxygen needs are 22 per cent of normal. The message from Dr Michael Davidson of Philadelphia's Germantown Hospital is that if resuscitation is continued, even when drowning is apparent, many of the $,000 people, especially children, who drown in the United States each year

The figures were nearly double the 622 cases in 1982. One leaked litre of seawater under the layers of clothing reduces insulation by 50 per cent - and could reduce survival time by the same amount. Fit is also vital. Five hundred men and women are being measured at the Offshore Survival Centre to produce a range of ideal sizes.

Upright danger

A fifth of sea deaths occur during, or shortly after, rescue. Three Fastnet race yachtsmen died in this period, and anecdeed in this period, and anec-dotal evidence going back to the last war records similar percent-ages. A cause, initially sug-gested by the Royal Navy, and now being explored by the Offshore Survival Centre, Aberdeen, is that stress on the body while victims are winched out of the water is to blame. Researchers led by physiologist Ian Light, have immersed men and women in a pool for up to an hour, fixed in a harness. The more perpendicular the body -the higher the head and the deeper the feet - the more detrimental is the effect of a vertical lift.

As Ian Light explains, at a the Pope's bodyguard was, and remains, Swiss. But I have the feeling that the Swiss attitude was always rather sober. The whole character of the people is not very enthusiastic anyway, except for their defence of their independence and freedom. Switzerland is a politically conservative country, but with a lot of common sense, and they usually looked at the papacy in

Peter Nichols meets the Swiss theologian who has challenged the Pope's infallibility

The Pope's no-man

And, of course, Switzerland was the leading country after Germany in producing the reform: Zwingli was second to Luther and this shaped the history of the country.

"For a long time Catholics were a minority. Now the numbers are more or less the ame. Relations became much closer after the Vatican Council. Certainly Protestant reserves however are increasing because of this papal visit. That is a fact. They are, for instance, counting the number of hours the Pope tacts, and complain that in six days there will be only six hours with non-catholics."

And those six hours includes his meetings with the World Council of Churches and with the Eastern Orthodox Church. Pointing to press releases from the Protestant side, Kung noted the fear expressed that confessional peace may be dis-turbed by the visit.

What is very strong, though, in Switzerland, and will be very much in the Pope's favour is this: because of Switzerland's record for freedom and because of the continual Swiss battle for independence, there is a lot a sympathy for Poland. The Pope is considered to be against the communist system and for his country's freedom. There has even been an attempt on his life, and a lot of these things in the field of foreign policy are helpful for him.

The visit is seen to be good for tourism and people will make money from it

The visit is seen to be good for tourism and people will make money from it. "Nevertheless the bishops were worried that not enough people would go to the mass meeting planned at Lucerne. And so I heard that they made a special point of inviting foreign workers in the country, all the Italians, and the others who they think will be a little more enthusiastic about the Pope than the Swiss."

There has been talk in Switzerland that the initiative for the visit came from the Pope rather than from the Swiss bishops. This was Professor comment on the attitude of the bishops.

"At the beginning, they said it would be a very modest visit, according to the traditions of how rich one is; you have to behave in a modest way, and not with a lot of show. And so, this was considered a pastoral visit and a modest one, without pomp and ceremony. But now the television spectacle alone will change that. This will be the biggest production ever organized by Swiss television: 30 hours of transmission and 110 persons involved. No critical reporting is foreseen, just as was the case during the Pope's visit to Germany." This is regular feature of papal visits?

My own analysis is that there are three elements which assure the success of papal visits. The first is that the papal speeches are mostly drafted in the country which the Pope is to visit. That is why what he says in Scotland is a little different from what he says in England and what he says in Germany is different again. We made little reference in Germany to the people thought this was receding in importance. But when he went to the Philippines he repeated it strongly, If his speeches in Switzerland are prepared by the Swiss bishops, he will once again steer clear of birth-control because there it is still a hot issue". The second element to ensure success is that, especially on television, you have safe people reporting the visit, who will not make critical comments. "The third is that all the texts prepared for his addresses have to go to Rome for approval.

And that is the reason why the Pope himself never sees any clear statement on political And so he is surprised when rotests are made such as that by a nun during his visit to the United States who wanted a the church, and one made in Germany by a girl representing young Catholics who comlained of what she called the church's lack of a sense of uman partnership, and its failure to understand problems of sexuality and of priestly

And this was a tremendous event here when it happened but it was due only to a break in the system of control.

What did, the Pope's ban on Professor Kung as an official teacher of theology mean in effect? The compromise which he arrived at with the auth-orities of Tübingen University means that he lectures now in his capacity as director of the university's Institute for Ecumenical Research. On balance he feels that he is in a stronger position than before.

"They tried to make of me a peripheral figure in the univerperipheral at all. As director of the institute I have complete this country. In Switzerland, it university, and more people is not considered good to show come to my lectures than come to my lectures than before. Also, a colleague from the German Department and I have established courses interdisciplinary lectures. Students can come from all departments. This became a very great success. My new book on eternal life is based on these lectures. Similarly, my next book on world religions is the outcome of these courses. Almost 1,000 people come to hear me every Monday evening.

"What was intended as a punishment proved to be also an advantage. I can make my own programme. If I want to concentrate on world religions I am no longer bound to follow the official course of Catholic theology. I am not bound by any curriculum. We have also organized two important international symposiums of theology. The institute is also at work on a study of women in Christianity.

> I would specially speak out for the partners in mixed marriages

When I asked Professor Kung to sum up the pontificate of John Paul II, he did so in largely cumenical terms: "People will forget the travelling because the Pope's journeys have done little to change anything for the better. I was surprised how even in Britain they have been fascinated by nice words without any action. Nothing of a kind has happened in the whole ecumenical field since this pontificate began. "For the Pope to go to a Lutheran church, that is nothing. It would have been a step forward if he had said there: 'Pastor, I am sure that you are a real pastor and that you are celebrating the Eucharist in a valid way'.

"And when he goes to Switzerland, this would be one of the things that would really be a step forward: not to speak more nice words and establish another commission - that is not what I mean - but to say, after half a millennium has passed since Reformation, that the Reformed pastors in Switzerland are validly ordained munion service is a valid

"It would be good, instance, that partners in mixed marriages could go together either to a Reformed or Catholic church. Protestants could be welcomed at mass while Catholics could, if they had good reason for doing so, go to Protestant services. And I would specially speak out for the partners in mixed marriages. I think that a great deal of this pontificate is rhetoric - no renewal within the church and no ecumenism. Just rhetoric.

An unloved son and his subtle anguish

those who have already seen the published extracts from this book may need some assurance that its title is not a misnomer: this is indeed a biographical study of the author's father and not merely a public attempt to discredit his mother, Rebecca West. But, in the technical sense, before he can convince us of his story Mr West is obliged to discredit his mother's version of crucial events in his own life. The book begins and concludes with this act of discrediting. And although innumerable other witnesses are attacked: Trotsky's account of Lenin's view of H. G. Wells, for instance, or the Fabian Old Guard view, or less importantly the views of recent scholars in the field - still the most immediately field — still the most immediately controversial aspect of the book is its matricidal quality.

Rebecca West is not, after all. Joan Crawford or some well known showbiz monster. She comes across as a figure for whom interrity and morality are of prime impostance. When we are told of George Orweil that he, perhaps, never witnessed a hanging or shot an elephant, we are forced to pause for breath; but we can still say — in that case he was a very good short story writer. If on very good short story writer. If on the other hand we were told that his account of his experiences in Spain was a complete fiction we would have to do some fairly radical rethinking. And if Mr West is right that his mother concocted a bogus archive and planted evidence in the form of letters in order to paint a picture of her relationship with Wells (not to mention their son) which was the reverse of the truth. then we shall indeed have to do more than panse for breath. That sense of the morality of her perceptions will be undermined.

with its origins in the last century.

The crucial ancestor is Wells's mother, who hated her husband and the Bromley shop in which Wells grew up, and who eventually went off into service leaving her family behind. The fact that she did not love her son had two major consequences first, she did her level best to prevent him continuing a promising education by twice best to prevent him continuing a promising education by twice having him bound apprentice in jobs which had absolutely no future; more importantly, Wells was clearly left with an inability to form a permanent and satisfactory loving relationship with any woman. His second wife, Jane, found that this suited her in some ways. She connived hat Wells's affairs, as long as she approved of the cirls be took. as she approved of the girls he took up with. And she saw to it that the establishment she provided for Wells to come home to was sufficiently attractive to him to ensure that he always did, in the pastime in a class with golf or This theory is untrue, and this book shows its untruth very clearly. For a start, despite those reliable contraceptive devices, unmarried women did mysteriously become pregnant after intercourse with Wells; they also become suicidal. In one case the unfortunate Amber Reeves (the original of Ann Veronica) became both pregnant and suicidal, with consequences that included: her marrying a man she did not love, her father suffering a breakdown considerable misery for her mother, public scandal, black-mail through the law, a massive row in the Fabian Society, resulting in the daughter through liaison being brought up in ignorance of her true parentage - only to suffer wretchedly on finding out the truth.

Wells - one crucial failure of imagination - and Rebecca West, the

ot all of these consequences were directly Wells's fauit. After all he was not responsible for the hypoc-risies of his day. He was a public defender of the rights of women and of a liberal attitude to morals. Indeed it was precisely because of his notoriety in this respect that so many women sought him out for a fling, coming and going without bother or fuss, according to Mr West, having occupied his "awk-ward hour" – which was between five and seven in the afternoon. From a contemporary perspective it might have seemed as if the casualties of Wells's promiscuity were in fact victims of society. Yet from the perspective provided by this book it is obvious that Wells was emotionally lacking. The im-agination for which he was famous was deficient in this crucial respect. The power of reason, in which he had always had such faith, was finally shaken when he realized that he had become dependent on Moura Budberg and that his dependence was in no way affected by the knowledge that she was spying for

This combination of faith in reason and emotional deficiency has a certain period flavour (there is something of the same quality in Bertrand Russell). The women of the book suffer from a similar trait they allow their zeal for liberation to take them beyond their emotional capabilities. They read - or rather they misread - Ibsen (you may remember that Ibsen was horrified to find that a woman had left her husband and child as if on the advice of Nora in The Dolls House). And the one who decided to call herself Rebecca West soon found herself out of her depth. She could not face motherhood, so her son grew up calling her Aunty Panther. and it is clear that this symbolic refusal to be a mother and to allow her son natural access to his father's affections is a key to the story Mr West has to tell.

For he was determined that he would find his father both emotionally during Wells's life and biographically afterwards. At the beginning of his quest in the leafter the reputation of Wells was in 1940s, the reputation of Wells was in something of an eclipse (although the shadow of this eclipse passed over the literary establishment and seems to have spared the general reading public). As time went on something happened which Wells himself had probably not foreseen; Rebecca West's reputation as a serious writer grew and grew, until it seemed to the son that it was being used once again to blot out the father. Nothing biographical could be done about this until the mother's death, so Mr West had had to wait a long time.

As a result and to a remarkable degree this book is both a considered biography and an outburst. Its psychological structure is very subtle. It is full of essay-length portraits of key figures and move-ments as well as historical back-ground. There are masses of characters but none of them appear incidental. And yet the rage which Mr West can feel when describing, say, the first Fabians gives you the impression that he himself has just been patronized or thwarted by them. He is fighting his father's battles all over again - the battle against the unloving mother being the first of many.

The hard truth of Normandy

The Battle for Normandy in 1944 will probably become one of those epic battles in world history like Marathon, Water-loo, or Gettysburg which can be written about by successive generations of authors and historians without losing their compelling interest. Max Hastings has used all the more important official histories, biographies, and autobiographies to provide the framework of his pen portrait of Overlord. He has fleshed it out with personal interviews of a wide cross-section of British, American, Canadian, and German participants, some of whom, like Field Marshals Lord Carver and Sir Edwin BramalL have since risen to military and political eminence. His sourcescan possibly be faulted on the German side because he does not appear to have consulted the important collection of German War Diaries of von Rundstedt's HQ and of the 7th and 15th German Armies held by the Imperial War Museum. The question Hastings sets out to answer and does so successfully, is how it was that, despite the losses suffered by the German Army in Russia and despite the Allies' overwhelming material superiority, particularly in the air. Eisen-hower's forces made such heavy weather of the fighting once they were safely ashore. The picture he paints of the high level controversies about Mont-gomery's tactical handling of operations, of the unfortunately persistent disagreements with the Air Forces, and of the inherent national rivalries and antagonisms between the Allies, is clearly and fairly presented. Nevertheless, he rightly points out that far too much attention has already been focused on the command decisions, and 100 little upon the actual capabili- xander McKee's 1964 edition of ties of the Allied and German forces expected to carry them out. This leads him to the central theme of his book: whenever the Allies met the it. Nevertheless, it is based Germans on anything like equal upon a mass of contemporary Germans on anything like equal terms the Germans always the Germans lost it only after Allied numerical and material superiority was well past the professionalism of the German Army was bound to collanse.

Max Hastings highlights three reasons for the Allies' failure: the stark difference in ethos between the two sides, the Allied servicemen doing an unwelcome job in the cause of democracy and depending upon fire power to save lives, and the German Army, profoundly influenced by events in the East, fighting to the last to escape Götterdammerung: the marked inferiority of the allied armies' equipment, particularly their lack of a tank to match the German Tigers and Panthers; and the Allies' over-estimate of what the Allied Air Forces could do to help win the land battle. He gives Montgomery and Bradley full credit for understanding the limitations of their forces and the dynamism of the Germans, which their contemporaries, including Churchill and Eisenhower failed to grasp. The attritiona battles they fought matched the realities of the situation and were successful - in the end. This book is an excellent starting point for anyone who has been inspired by the 40th Anniversary of D Day to learn more about Overlord without wading through the tomes of the Official Histories. For those who know a lot about it already Hastings's second generation udgements are interestingly free from chauvinism. For both it is a very readable book. (The maps could be better placed). The same cannot be said of the reissued version of Ale-Caen, the Anvil of Victory (Souvenir Press, £9.95). It may have been a classic in its time, but now has a dated ring about accounts by eye-witnesses which cannot be recreated. It is worth re-reading as a supplement to Hastings' book.

The ladies, as their maid habitually referred to them, were two of nature's flat dwellers. Houses implied families, which both of them abhorred. Many of their years were spent in Braemar Mansions, a turreted building looking like Balmoral – or so they told their friends – just off Gloucester Road. Though the régime was sometimes rather Hinge and Bracket, with sudden squabbles and quite minor storms in teacups, it was more often very hushed and terribly no-nonsense. some more of Ivy's twaddle", it argues most persuasively, she who had provided that special tone of voice one recognizes now as so very Compton-Burnett. Through Margaret she learned the art of subterfuge in facing the emotional shambles of the human heart.

The friends who stimulated and amused her most were men. particularly men as far removed as possible from the Victorian paterfamilias image. She loved flamboyant aesthetes such as Ernest Thesiger, whose idea of a good joke, when playing Polonius in Moscow, was to write on a blank wall "Burgess loves Maclean". But the most steadily creative of her friendships were surely those with women, with whom she felt the mystic rapport of shared experience. Much as Hope Craumer in Parents and Children who liked her own sex best:

Most people do. It is a thing that has speech he asks pleadingly: not been noticed. People know too much about their own sex to think it possible to prefer it, when really they find it familiar and congenial.

Speech he asks pleadingly: "How could I reply? I would merely offer a few more days of headlines exposing the Labour quarrels."

A long time in politics

Michael Foot's account of the 1983 election campaign and its outcome makes sad reading. There is a self-pity, born of what he calls the agony of Labour's defeat, which was foreign to his nature in happier times. Self-knowledge struggles with the need to establish that the party was brought down, as indeed it was, by other agencies than his own shortcomings as a leader.

Those he acknowledges with splendid candour. "We had not the armour, the strength, the quickness in manoeuvre, yes, the leadership" to ward off attackers.

He endorses Denis Healey's Though, Margaret, of course, bad little time for Ivy's books and is said to have delivered a campaign but in the three manuscript to Gollancz with the preceding years. They were the Healey's criticisms, was she who had made Ivy's observes, were direct criticisms writing career feasible and indeed, as Hilary Spurling had been too comradely to say

> But much of the blame is laid off, fairly. He is angry about the national daily and Sunday newspapers, of which 14 opposed and only three supported Labour, and wants something undefined done about them before next time. "The contest must be made a little cleaner and fairer and we should not be afraid of the means to secure it." We are warned. Something must also be done about the "inordinate and irresponsible" power of the opinion polls. He does not know what, but is opposed to their suppression or censorship. Was it his or his party's fault that he was bound to be caught so often in false positions? The picture he draws shows a victim, never a master, of events; not a leader, but a loser from the start. Of the Callaghan

It is actually rather more than a century: when the show of Rosenthal porcelain from its beginnings to the present started out it was a centenary show in 1979, but now that it has reached the Victoria and Albert Museum (until July 1) another five years have gone by and there have been several important additions to the company's grand series of limited-edition pots, the Studio-Linie, like Roy Lichtenstein's Tea Set, hot off the production line this very

For Rosenthal, though the firm began very modestly with humorous ashtrays and the like, very soon found an important place for knowingly artistic activities among the porcelain normally produced.

As well as imposing decorative pieces, the Jugendstil period offers some finely simple, subtle pots like the oddly named Botticelli/Darmstadt coffee service (curvaceous leaf patterns on a coolly elegant white base) which were very clearly meant for practical use. Nan Red (TVS) was the last of a number of programmes devoted to the events of D-Day, although this was one of the lucky few not to include the unmistakable sound of Vera Lynn. The appetite for war memories, or at least the urge which television companies have to provide them, seems inexhaustible – this particular merely offering an occasion which other war dramas and entaries are quite prepared to do without.

The hall came in 1967; the Aldeburgh Foundation now supports activities the year round at Snape; and in 1979 a permanent home for the expanding Britten-Pears School for Advanced Musical Studies was opened within the Maltings complex.

Perhaps the most remarkable feature of this recital was its authentic atmosphere. In the opening group there may have been little in the way of profound musical thought, for all the fascination offered by the work that would be distilled later into the famous La Campanella, namely the Grande Fanissa de bravure sur "Là clochette" (1832).

Nor was the splashiness inevitable in virtuosic Liszt a particularly pleasant listening experience. But Paik is a daredevil very much in the Lisztian mould, and the sheer physical thrill generated in his playing of the 1840 version of Mazeppa, the single-stave Emajor Paganini Study (1851) and the unusually concise A and the unusually concise A minor Grande Etude (1837) fully justified his casting of caution to the winds.

But if here Liszt the acrobat sprang into action, in the sequence of late works that opened the second half Liszt the mystic was reawakened. At last, in the haunting tritones of Nuages Gris (1881), the spinechilling markiness of the first La Lugibre Gondola (com-posed late in 1882 in reaction to Liszt's accurate premonition of Wagner's death) and the obsessive Trauervorspiel und Trauer-marsch (1885), Paik was able to show a considerable sense of poetry as he revelled in the strangeness of Liszt's spirituali-

Black mark for Kinnock

Labour's concern for Britain's black community may be less heartfelt than Shadow Home Secretary Gerald Kaufman would have had us believe on Channel 4's Black on Black on Tuesday night, Kaufman replaced the advertised interview with Neil Kinnock because, the presenter announced, the Labour leader had "a problem with British Rail", Kinnock had indeed been delayed - earlier in the day on his way to London from Blackpool. He was in the Commons for Question Time by 3.15; the deadline of the TV recording was 6 pm. Nonetheless his office phoned the programme to make the excuse, and sent Kaufman instead, "We must come pretty low in his list of priorities", says Black on Black's producer Trevor Phillips.
"The point of the programme was that black Labour members want to set up a black section because the party has let them down in the past and not taken them seriously. If it wanted to give ammunition to that view, this is an excellent way of doing it."

The American Ballet Theatre is said to be about to poach our own Sir Kenneth MacMillan, principal chor-cographer of the Royal Ballet. When the ABT's artistic director Mikhail Baryshnikov signed a new contract carrier this season, he insisted on being allowed to appoint an associate director. Apparently he approached American choreograpiter Twyla Tharp, but she turned him down. Now the talk is that Sir Kenneth is seriously considering the offer, but wants his favourite dancer Alessandra Ferri to go too. Yesterday he could not be reached: the Royal Ballet said he was in New York - visiting the American Ballet Obligingly accompanied by a photograph of himself, Jenkin has submitted four pages denouncing what he calls "GLC propagands 1984-style, masterminded by Ken Livingstone and his expensive PR and describing the antiabolition campaign as "downright nonsense; but then what would you expect from Mr Livingstone?" The CLC is not a jot offended. Indeed, it is "delighted that Patrick Jenkin has recognized that The Lendoner is a legitimate means of conveying views to Londoners". It will carry his pearls in full in the next issue. The right of reply? Readers can simply turn to the opposite page to find Ken Livingstone, who, I understand, is bounding his typewriter as we write.

It is important, in their private discussions this week, that the Prime Minister ties down the president until they have had a frank and clear exchange of views.

For, despite very obvious simi-

Much of it is created by their respective foreign services, who all too often have advised them into positions from which the only escape is political

The British Government has been dangerously unaware of the depth of the Administration's concern with the problem on the US's southern border. Had it been so aware, it would never have countenanced any suggestion of withdrawal from Belize until the region was more Central America is crucial to America The Soviet Union, seeing itself surrounded by enemies or potential enemies, and seeing America free of such shackles, naturally wants to redress the balance. Hostile states on the US southern border would fit the bill nicely. Soviet global strategy is directed towards detaching Europe from the US. Getting the US bogged down in Central America is one way to achieve this goal.

Europeans have tended to play down Soviet and Cuban involvement in Central America. But it is entirely possible that as a result of the determined destabilization of the area by the Soviet Union and Cuba, El Salvador could crack. This fissure could lead to Guatemala and on to Mexico. Then nearly one hundred million people on the US southern border would be under the influence or control of pro-Soviet regimes. Continuing failure by Britain to understand US horror at this prospect is foolhardy. Now consider a US failure. The budget deficit is a source of regret growing into annoyance in London as interest rates have been forced to rise through no fault of British economic policy.

Whenever the deficit is mentioned to Washington officials they smile politely. They say privately that they are bored with European complaints about the deficit and that they cannot do anything about it because of Congress.

This is simply not good enough. President Reagan is very good at persuading Congress to do what he wants. The elected representatives may grumble. They may take their time. But, in the end, they have usually complied with his wishes. US officials have not realized how dangerous the deficit could become, not just for their allies, but for

There are other misunderstandings. Britain tends to get caught up in the US's general Euro-pessimism. At the moment far too many US officials are still unaware of the great moral and material changes that have taken place in Britain during the past five years - far too unaware of the remarkable turnaround in its economic performance. It's no good blaming American insularity. We must point out Britain's achievements more forcefully.

Whether the president acts to improve the performance of the State Department or not, there is much the Prime Minister can and should do to improve the performance of the Foreign Office.

She must reaffirm clear policy goals for Britain's relationship with the US. She must oblige the Foreign Office to admit to and examine past failures to learn how to avoid repetition. There is an incipient anti-Americanism in Britain. Born out of a decline in international status, fuelled by Suez, and during the Falklands by the US attempts to negotiate a settlement instead of coming out in support immediately, given added zest by the divergence over Grenada. Unless the UK wants to reorientate itself towards an alliance with the Soviet Union, the Government must take steps to create enthusiasm for America. Many in the Foreign Office are either nervous or contemptuous of the Americans, or both. The increase in CIA covert action in Central America, the sight of a great battleship pounding the Lebanese mountains in impotent fury after the Lebanese withdrawal, the mining of the Nicaraguan ports, all have

For those who find these actions incomprehensible, even though they are consistent, for those who cannot accept that even though some of them may have been mistaken, keeping the Soviet Union guessing is a legitimate way to deter war, all the more reason to gain and hold the maximum possible influence over the American government.

Overt anti-Americanism or simple distain will not help to make the world a safer place. The principle goal of British foreign policy towards the US must be to exert as much influence as possible over decision making, domestic and foreign. To do so Britain must prove a reliable, sympathetic and wise ally. The Foreign Office has two fundamental tasks in the promotion of this goal. To provide accurate intelligence and to provide sound advice. It patently failed to provide intelligence on the Falklands and intelligence and advice on Grenada.

As a result of the Grenada failures the Foreign Secretary was made to look foolish in the House of Commons only hours before the invasion took place, and even now many close to the president remain astonished that the British were, and remained, so unhelpful.

It is conventional Foreign Office wisdom that the present US Administration speaks with many voices, that it is made up of insular, uncosmopolitan men, that friead-ships cannot be reliably made, that its actions cannot be accurately predicted. This, frankly, is feeble. Predicting the actions of foreign governments is, after all, the job of the Foreign Office. That the Americans parade their disagree-ments in public should make it easier, not harder, to discern their rolling trends.

Many close to President Reagan feel that British officials in the Washington Embassy prefer Demo-crats to Republicans. Many say that they are surprised that greater efforts have not been made to get to know them. They feel that British officials in Washington are unsympathetic to their concerns, regard the Reagan Administration as unreliable, unpredictable and dangerous. If this were true, it is all the more reason to become close, and so to exert restraining influence, Far more than any previous governments, President Reagan's men are ready to have close relations with Britain, not just so that they can get their own way. They appreciate, often more than the Briton they happen to be speaking to, how much experience and knowledge the British have to offer them. Many of them accept without demur that, politically, Reagan is Son of Thatcher.

At an unusually dangerous time for the world it is essential that great efforts are made to resolve problems between the allies. Even if President Reagan and Mrs Thatcher, in private discussions during the summit, clear all the air, and they probably will, there can be no confidence that the understanding they reach personally will work its way down through their respective foreign service bureaucracies unless they both take early and radical year - would be on sale in a shop financed by the whole factory but only to the privileged union members. A petition was sent to the factory council, protests were made to the management ("none of our business, strictly a union matter"), to the local party leadership, to the regional state distributors. It was all to little avail: the new unions, are caught in the dilemma of claiming to. represent the whole working class and at the same time of having to buy away their unpopularity by offering special perks to anyone who signs up.

The strained credibility of the new unions could be shrugged off by the Polish government as it is in other socialist countries, but recent developments have shown that the workers can make or break General Jaruzelski's economic reform pro-

Workers in a workers' state have two sources of power. The first is mythical; they are atotem pole of a communist state, every action is made in their name, from them all legitimacy flows. Every now and then they have to be consulted, the first four or five months of this every now and then policies have to be slightly tailored to show government responsiveness to the workers. The other source of power is the ability to block change. By simply downing tools - as happened in a holiday pay dispute in the FSO car factory - they can force the management to make concessions. Technically, strikes are allowed only as a last resort. In practice, as demonstrated in dozens of unpublicized cases since the lifting of martial law, the management will crumple and settle as quietly and quickly as possible.

The Solidarity underground has always grasped this shopfloor potential and has urged workers to convert it into a boycott of the new unions and into a production goslow, symbolized by the caricature of a snail that is scrawled on the wall of many Polish factories. Boycotting the unions is easy enough, even if the material incentives are attractive for older and retired workers, but goslows hit the pocket and 20 against the grain of skilled workers. Material shortages are already slowing down production, though less so than a year ago, in many sectors of

Ringmaster of the summit

lf, after this week's summit in London, the world's economic prospects look a little brighter, at least some of the credit should go to a energetic bachelor whose hobbies incude the study of other people's family trees. He is Nicholas Barrington, a 49-

year-old diplomat whose last tour of duty was in charge of the British mission in Tehran and who, but for a last-minute operational switch by the Foreign Office, would now be Brilish ambassador in Beirut. As it , after a short spell at the United Nations, he was drafted back to London six months ago as ringmas-ter for the biggest diplomatic circus that London has known for years. In 1977, when Britain first played host, the summit was manageable enough for a determined James Callaghan to squeeze everyone into Number Ten. But in subsequent years it has grown into the biggest, but not necessarily most effective, jamboree of its kind. Last year the Americans tried to bring it under control in the more relaxed atmosphere of Williamsburg, and Mrs Thatcher has imbued her staff with similar good intentions.

Even so Mr Barrington settled into his temporary office in the Old Admiralty Building early this year, faced with the joy of organizing 1.000 delegates and officials and an estimated 3,000 press representatives into a worthwhile conference. "If all goes well, no doubt someone else will get the credit, and if not then I shall probably get the blame", he said cheerfully this week amid milling workmen in the conference chose the Tudor Room in the headquarters at Lancaster House. The size of the circus ruled out alternative venues, such as Leeds Castle in Kent or Chevening. Security remains a headache for Barrington and his 20-man team of organizing officials - which includes a special security adviser from the Foreign Office. Most of the leaders are staying at their ambassadors' residences and seven London hotels were block-booked for ministers and other functionaries nine months ago. The times it will take for the official convoys to converge upon Lancaster House from all these addresses have been measured to the nearest minute, President Reagan, as the senior guest, will enjoy the privilege of arriving last.

The number of police who will be on duty has not been disclosed. But all police leave has been cancelled and several thousand officers are expected to be assigned, on overt or covert missions, to safeguard Mrs Thatcher's guests. West End traffic will be suspended at certain times to let the convoys pass. Mr Barrington, whose other interests include drawing and the theatre, has taken a lively personal interest in the more aesthetic side of the summit. Some of the maps and plans produced for visiting delegates and pressmen have been designed by himself. A venue for dinner on Friday night posed a problem, and he trawled round the West End and City in search of three rooms which were elegant, intimate, convenient, and above all, interesting. Finally he Saturday lunch at Lancaster House has been organized by Food from Britain, eight home firms providing smoked salmon. Norfolk turkey, apple mousse and English cheeses, washed down with bottles of Spots Farm 1981 and Adjestone 1982.

If security has been a problem, the media have been an even bigger one.
Official news is unlikely to be plentiful during the first two days and the thought of 3,000 itinerant newsmen wandering through London with perhaps to the state of don with nothing better to do than "speculate" has made Whitehall uneasy about the strength of the pound. One solution seems to have been to provide plenty of photo-calls to keep the cameramen happy while plying reporters in the Connaught Rooms with abundant food and

But if this summit will be remembered for anything, short of an economic miracle, it could be the influence of privatization. Nearly 60 British firms and organizations have provided their goods and services free, in return for the opportunity to display their expertise before world leaders and the attendant press. Free ties, pens, and even madallions in presentation boxes from the Royal Mint, are among the gifts. For media representatives, there is a briefcase provided by the Bank of Scotland and Standard Chartered Bank Much of the electronic gadgetry in the press centre has been laid on without charge by companies anxious to display it.

The summit has taken six months to prepare and will last for three days, after which Mr Barrington will return to an assistant undersecretary's desk at the Foreign Office. The captains and kings will depart and work starts somewhere else on next year's summit.

will have proved damaging not only economically but also for the Government's standing with many rank-and-file trade unionists. Simple victory for the Coal Board is not enough; much more should be done to make the miners see the strength of the Government's case. Like government, successful industrial management depends on consent and on the understanding of its

No government can afford too many enemies. Though there is no need to take too seriously Mr David Basnett's dramatic threats of the worst of all winters of discontent next year, there is increased restiveness in the public sector, and the Government needs to do more than it has been doing to make its case politically.

Ministers should also tread sensitively, and it was not helpful when Mr Tom King, the Employment Secretary, suddenly revealed last weekend (in answer to journalists' questions) that the Trade Union ists' questions) that the Trade Union Bill now ending its progress through Parliament may be amended to allow immunity only to those strikes which have been sanctioned by a majority in a ballot.

As the bill is now absurdly worded, unions are obliged to hold a strike ballot but can still declare a strike, with immunity, if the ballot has a no-strike majority. (Thus, theoretically, a strike could be declared with immunity on (say) a 30 per cent affirmative vote.) The anomaly arose because it was at first felt best not to pressure unions about the precise majority needed, and because it was assumed that in practice they would not flout an anti-strike majority.

So the proposed amendment, though it came as a bolt from the blue to Mr King's colleagues, is simply common sense. But its timing in the middle of the miners' strike (though this has given it added relevance) looked too much like devising law on the trot as a political expedient for current problems. What should have been in the Bill from the first looked like an antiunion gesture.

While the Government leaves Mr MacGregor to see Mr Scargill off, it needs to do more thinking about how to convince union members and financial solvency is to their own advantage. It should consider what it can do where there are closed pits to assist in bringing work to those who do take redundancy.

Two years after Disraeli's death. an article in The Times observed that he had discerned the Conservative working man in the inarticulate mass of the English populace "as the sculptor perceives the angel prisoned in a block of marble". The Government needs that discernment today, and a more fluent tongue, as it attempts to liberate the individual trade unionists who have been used by the likes of Mr Scargill.

I can see that it is not a question to keep any but the most neurotic or most literary of you lying awake and sucking your thumbs o'nights. But it has me.

We were supposed to publish the results in the five national journals on May 29 as a literary fanfare for the European elections. But not a whisper or aposul have I heard from Paris about the results. It may be that the calculations are proving more complex for the computer than was supposed. But I have an uneasy feeling that my friend the Redacteur en Chef Adjoint of Lire magazine has got fed up with seeing his organ described as a down-market Frog TLS, and with the brisk air of Rasbif badinage with which The Times has approached the project, and has struck us off his mailing list. I dare not telephone, for fear of un-pleasantness: in any case I am appalled by the amount of my day that is already spent in waiting for publishers and journalists to vacate their telephones in London, without hanging about on the end of a line to

I think that what we had better do s publish the results of the British jury; and hope that we are given the opportunity in due course to compare it with the votes of the juries in the four other countries.

Readers of The Times were invited to send in their lists of the 10 greatest Spanish, German, Italian, and French "creative" writers (that is, apparently, not historians or philosophers) of all time, provided that there's that they were dead. No fewer than 167 of you sent in lists of varying merit: which I thought was pretty commendable. I totted up the votes by a complex system of the new

Your adjudicator would like to make the following comments:

1. I know that many of you had difficulty in thinking of the names of 10 German and Spanish writers you had ever heard of, let alone read; but it was going a bit far of five of you to include Hitler in your lists of the 10 greatest German writers, and even to fustify his inclusion: "He comes across in English as a considerable wit." Come to think of it, perhaps this is why The Times has been put on a blacklist by the French organizers.

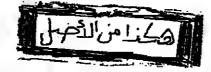

2. To speak of the Top Ten European authors without allowing for Russians and Greeks was daft.

3. The ban on philosophers and historians was misguided. Hegel and Nietzsche must surely count as creative writers for Germany; Gibbon for England; and Machia velli for Italy.

4. This fashion for literary lists is not new. Mostyn T. Pigott, the founder of Isis, did The Hundred Best Books in verse a century ago:

first time today; and the parleying between the board and the union has begun. The thing to hold on to at this stage is the commercial objective in opposition to which the strike was called. This is to close, over a reasonably short span of time, those pits from which, because of their geological properties or stage of depletion, coal can be dug only at a cost unacceptably greater than the price at which it can be sold in the marketplace. That is what matters: bellicose rhetoric of victory and defeat. siege and surrender, less so. Provided Ministers can point to the assertion of their commercial objective, Mr Scargill can make of it what he will; but the truth must be self-evident in the way the National Coal Board implements its plans,

Securing the commercial objective does not necessarily require total rigidity in respect of the board's previously announced contraction programme for 1984. Mr MacGregor has already indicated that there is scope for compromise over phasing, once the principle of contraction is accepted. Since then the cumulative loss of production from the strike and deterioration in the condition of many of the strike-bound collieries, which may delay or in some cases prevent their reopening, will have impinged on the assessed need for immediate reduction in the capacity of the industry, and on the rate of natural or redundancy-induced manpower wastage. That is one element in a possible settlement of the dispute. Another, also adumbrated by the board, is its examination of ways, in conjunction with other agencies, of bringing new business and work to communities which would have the heart Yard, which has been coordinatknocked out of them by pit closures. Sitting it out until the NUM is ready to budge on the main issue. probably means prolongation of the mass manoeuvres of pickets and police. No one can contemplate the spectacle of force, threat and violence at the heart of an industrial dispute without dismay. It was good to have Mr Kinnock's forthright condemnation of violence on the picket line last week, however late in the day. It would be better still to have an equally outspoken repudiation from the leaders of the trade union movement.

It is from within their movement that the offence has arisen. They must know that a challenge of numbers threatening violence will be met by counter-force. law are in jeopardy the police. whatever degree of force is unions to stand with the minuse required to meet the threat. picketing strikers come. The police then cease b be seen as belonging to hose communities, and are seen as set over against them. A process is begun, and sedulously forcered. that seeks to set police and people apart. Malicious and subversive minds then seek to exploit incidents where weight of numbers and overt violence oblige the police to respond with riot gear and snatch tectics. The spiral is well documented in the Irish corner of the kirgdom.

The only beneficiaries are those who seek to fracture and disorder society in pursuit of political and social goals which the constitutional machinery will not deliver because they are not commonly wanted. High among the victims of that degenerative condition of society are trade union constitutionalists and the people they represent. Of course the miners strike under the generalship of Mr Scargill has not taken us far down that road. But it is a mad; and feet are on it. It behoves all parties directly or indirectly implicated to consider very carefully where they are.

A conference of chief officers of police and members of local police suthorities happened to be meeting last week when some of the worst scenes of violence were being enacted elsewhere. Worries on the local government side went beyond the cost of it all and the strain on police manpower and resources; extending to the spucture of democratic accountability for policing. The national reporting centre at Scotland ing police mebilization for duty some to be suspect as an embryonic rational directorate of police apparently accountable to no one. Other police spokesmen have complained that the police have been left to take the strain of the miners' dispute while new laws oriensibly framed to cope with aggressive secondary picketing bave remained folded

The reasons that the coal board has not sought enforcement of the injunction it was! granted by the court at the beginning of the dispute are understood; that to do so would unite a union that was fatally (from its point of view) divided: that in the short run at least Where civil peace and the rule of enforcement would stimulate rather than check violence; that will act. dispute to the advantage of Mr Scargill, who is playing it that way.

The arguments are persuasive. but they leave the new remedy, of injunction followed by limitless raids on a union's funds in case of persistent disobedience, looking, in relation to the largest and most picketed dispute since the remedy became available, decidedly like those deterrent weapons whose efficacy is not to be doubted, but the consequences of whose efficacy are not to be contemplated. There is nothing effective about deter-rence if it can be so easily and persistently ignored.

Ministers too will have to examine their experience of this strike. They acknowledge the need to review the law pertaining to public order, which includes the behaviour of pickets. They should also as a result of the disclosures yesterday reflect more generally on the coordination of their policies in the nationalized industries, and in the area of industrial relations as they most particularly affect the public sector.

The legal privileges of trade unions had become excessive and too subject of abuse. They had to be curbed. There was an imbalance of advantage between the parties to collective bargaining. That had to be redressed. Individual trade unionists needed, and still need protection against petty tyranny by union officials. The pretensions of trade union magnates to an exofficio place in the government of the country had to be punctured. These were all necessary correctives to law and custom that had evolved in a way that had clearly become detrimental to the general good. The corrective process is not complete; much still needs to be done in this parliament. The trade union movement has naturally portrayed these correctives as evidence that the government's real appetite is not for trade union reform but for the general eclipse of trade unionism. Of course free trade unions are necessary to development in continuity of the democratic industrial society we have, and they are necessary to adjustment in continuity to the profound changes in technology and working practices that are already above the horizon. But not exclusively so.

Free trade unions are a component in a society grounded in consent, and they hould be seen as such, though we should not be bullied by their spokesmen into forgetting that they represent only a minority of the working population.

If their resentment at being deprived of legal immunities which they now neither need nor deserve were to drive union leaders more into the arms of elements that are malignant to the established order, that would only confirm how important and timely is a policy on industrial relations which seeks to establish a much more direct link between the enjoyment of a privileged position under the law and the exercise of some greater responsibility consistent with that privilege. That applies not just to the NUM; it applies to them all.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

on the beat

From the Chief Constable of Sussex Sir, In responding to your leading article of June 4 ("From Lestrade to Newman") may I first declare an interest, for I write not only as a chief constable but as Director of Police Extended Interviews, which charges me with the task of overseeing arrangements for the selection of candidates with suitable intellectual and personal qualities for places at the Police Staff College. Bramshilt-

This selection procedure applies not only to talented young men and women who have joined the service as recruits in the normal way, but to those who opt to take advantage of the avenues for accelerated promotion provided by the graduate entry scheme. At a higher level, it is also concerned with the selection of those already holding posts as middle managers in the police who aspire to fill very senior appointments by way of the senior command course at Bramshill.

It may be reassuring to your readers to learn that chief officers share your concern that the leaders of Britain's police in the next century should be fully equipped for their task. This is demonstrated by the fact that in January of this year 43 of Britain's top police officers, worned by a dearth of applicants for senior appointments, devoted a weekend seminar to this very

As you imply, academic qualification, intellectual capacity, personal qualities, linked with development training are of paramount importance, but the seminar also identified a number of other key factors which need close scrutiny by those who control the destiny of Britain's police if the very best material is to be found to fill top appointments in the future.

First and foremost, there is a need to provide sufficient incentives in terms of financial reward and conditions of service to ensure every encouragement for those with the necessary talents to uproot family and home in order to move from one force area to another in search of experience and increased responsibility.
Even though our junior and
even though our junior and

intermediate ranks are well recompensed, at the top level the police service compares unfavourably with industry. There is a need also to develop a system of career planning which will ensure that those who have proved themselves are encouraged to seek appointments beyond the boundaries of their own force areas. The police service already offers an exciting and challenging career, but I suggest that the path to the top must be more clearly signposted for those with exceptional talent and vision who are contemplating taking their first steps on the beat, including many of the 4.176 graduates now serving in our ranks. Yours etc. ROGER BIRCH.

Prince and architects From Mr John Crookshank

Sir, The very vehemence of the response to Prince Charles's com-ments on modern British architecture by some leading architects leads the lay observer to believe that he may have hit the nail on the head.

The only part of his speech with which I would not agree was the disparaging comment about the proposed Mies van der Rohe building being "better suited to downtown Chicago". Chicago is, in fact, rich in good modern buildings, in addition, of course, to the early skyscrapers for which it is famous, and so are most American cities.

The Americans seem to be able to blend new construction in with the older buildings most effectively with examples such as San Francisco, Philadelphia and the new wing of Washington's National Gallery being only some of many.

There are several older cities which are still fairly grim, but somehow one feels that in, say, five years' time places like Baltimore. Pittsburg and Dallas will be architecturally more pleasing than Glasgow Manchester and Birming-ham because the American architects have more sense of time and place, because they are given their heads more in commercial terms and, I feel, because an influential proportion of the citizens are proud of their cities and want them to reflect this pride in architectural

Politics at PNL

From Mr Neil Fletcher

Sir, Few people can be less fitted than Lord Annan (May 28) to criticise the performance of the governors at the Polytechnic of North London. His immoderate onslaught has besmirched the reputation of many honourable governors of the polytechnic, who have served conscientiously with little public recognition for years, he has unjustifiably damaged the good pame of the polytechnic; and, although this worries me less, he has belittled himself in the process. Perhaps of all polytechnics and colleges in the country the Polytech-nic of North London has the best finds hostility among a student body comprising many of his prospective record of recruiting black students. many of them Londoners and on degree courses only because of the access courses and special entry arrangements that have enabled isolation, properly shunned by decent students and staff who find them in their twenties and thirties to

Sir, In July, 1983, in a major review of the international dimension of economic recovery, this association expressed its disappointment at the "collective complacency" that had characterised last year's economic summit at Williamsburg Virginia. Few have since denied that the international financial system may now be facing its greatest crisis since the 30s. . In October, 1983, we further criticised the attitude of the US Administration, over IMF funding in particular, at both Williamsburg and the Washington IMF meeting in September, We said:

September, We said:

on such measures available at the London economic summit this weekend, can the world's political and business leaders afford a further round of platitudes? In particular, will the other world leaders, especially those in the EEC facing Important European... Parliamen elections, summon up the political will to act together to oblige the American Administration to take urgent action on the bloated US $190m deficit, which is one factor raising interest rates and which thus so clearly threatens recovery in Europe?

In 1981, when there existed a large amount of unused economic capacity in the world, the US deficit was not only defensible but was beginning, in the short term, to fuel recovery. It is now the one ear of US private sector borrowing. For that recovery to be aborted would dash what hope remains to the 30,000,000 unemployed people in the OECD area.

In the meantime, can a means be devised by which the main drive of international financial support given to the Third World countries is designed to alleviate to a tolerable level the interest rates which they pay, without the destabilising effect of altering the effective payments to Finally, chambers of commerce, their very nature, are well aware that jobs depend on trade. So the economic summit must vigorously tackle the threats towards protectionism in international trade, whether among the advanced countries or between them and the debtor countries.

British industry and commerce, however, continues to lay emphasis on fair trading policies and realistic exchange rates, Britain's UK trade deficit with western Europe has increased from just over £2bn in 1981 to one of over £6.5bn in 1983 and one of over £1.8bn in the first three months of 1984.

Conflicting creeds

From the Reverend P. R. Forster Sir, In response to the letter from the Dean of Durham (May 23) and your subsequent leading article (May 26) two things need to be said.

Firstly, that although the 1938 report, entitled Doctrine in the Church of England, acknowledged as a minority viewpoint the ideas now put forward by the Dean and Bishop-designate of Durham, moves at the time to use this report as a basis for an official restatement of Anglican belief was rejected. Had official recognition been given to the questioning of the basic statements of the historic creeds of Christianity about the virgin birth and physical resurrection of Jesus, one hesitates to imagine the consequences of such a formal declaration of heresy.

Teachers' pay claim

From Professor D. Cameron Watt Sir, HMG has just offered a 4.2 per cent salary increase to university teachers. As a result of five years of salary increases consistently lower than the annual rate of inflation. university teachers' salaries are now 22 per cent less, in real terms, than they were in 1979. The salaries of many professors, frozen for five years of the previous seven, have declined even more precipitately in

The AUT (Association of University Teachers) has rejected this claim and called on its local associations to take "appropriate action". In so doing it is betraying still further the stupidity and betrayal of the duties and obligations of its members begun when it imported a professional trade unionist as its general secretary, and affiliated itself to the TUC.

An academic's principal oblipations, as a professional, are to his field of learning and to his students. To be an academic is a profession. For the council of AUT to call for appropriate action is to use a deliberate ambiguity designed to put the responsibility for action which

Assembling for school worship

From the Headmaster of Friern Barnet Grammar School Sir, On July 24, 1943, your leader writer, commenting on Mr Butler's and Mr Chuter Ede's White Paper, Educational Reconstruction, described it as a landmark in English education and said that it promised the greatest and grandest educational advance since 1870".

Out of Educational Reconstruction grew the 1944 Education Act. an important part of which is now under fire. The threatened clause concerns compulsory school assemblies and is found in part II, section 25 of the Act:

It declares, in effect, that the school day in every county and voluntary school, so long as its premises are practical for the purpose, should start with collective worship on the part of all pupils.

It is being suggested that this clause should be excised or redrafted so as to allow schools to have "greater flexibility in meeting the needs of a multi-cultural society". Such a change should be resisted by both the legislature and the churches, R. A. Butler built into the rubric of the Act more than enough flexibility to cope with modern circumstances.

For example, the term "collective worship" connotes a wide range of activities: listening quietly to a reading or a piece of music, saying "Amen" at the end of a prayer, applauding a school football result or simply being together in visible community. Even in 1944 the concept "worship" was pretty fluid.

Elsewhere in the Act sectamanism was explicitly proscribed with the words: "the collective act of worship should not be distinctive of any particular denomination". Parents who nevertheless sensed a religious stricture operating in these arrangements were enabled by the Act to withdraw their children from assemblies on conscientious grounds.

Act has been the serviceability of its rubric through forty years of substantive educational change. Its longevity is not yet exhausted. I respectfully suggest that while ours remains a country where religion is "by law established" in the structures of the state, it is both unnecessary and imprudent to write out of law the encouragement of compulsory worship in our state schools.

Badly lent, badly spent From Mr Paul Barcau

Sir. Your leading article. "Badly lent, badly spent" (May 26), fails to mention what was by far the most important single factor responsible for the large increase in borrowing by the less developed countries in the 1970s. It was the successive explosions in the price of oil.

Eurovision finals dull in the extreme This created chaos in international balances of payments: huge surpluses for OPEC countries, comparable deficits for oil importers. For the poorer, non-oil producing countries these deficits had to be financed by external borrowing or aid.

That assistance should, ideally, have been provided by the appropriate international institutions, the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and its "soft loan" subsidiary. The task proved far too great for the resources at their disposal. The "recycling" of the surpluses of some into the deficits of others fell to the commercial banks.

Admittedly some lenders overstepped the bounds of orthodox banking discretion. But they pre-vented a sequence of "sovereign" defaults which could have resulted in a situation graver than that which exists today.

Unwittingly, perhaps, the commercial banks saved the day. They deserve better than the implied judgment of your leader writer: "let them stew in their own juice". Yours faithfully. PAUL BAREAU The Reform Club, Pall Mail, SW1.

Van Dyck's Venetia bought by the portrait gallery

By Geraldine Norman

The National Portrait Gallery yesterday announced the acquisition of a superb portrait from an unknown source: Van Dyck's allegorical depiction of Venetia Stanley, Lady Digby, as Prudence".

Its value on the open market could well be as much as £1m but the gallery would say only that it had been valued at "several hundred thousand". and that the gallery had only had to pay about a third of the valuation as the private treaty sale was exempt from tax.

Venetia Stanley was a celebrated beauty and courtesan and was, in her youth, "kept as his concubine" by the third Earl of Dorset. She graduated from a life of sin to marry Sir Kenelm Digby, "the handsomest gentleman of England", Venetia proved a model wife but died in 1633, only seven years after her marriage. Sir Kenelm mourned extravagantly. He commissioned Van Dyck to paint her on her death bed. Van Dyck also painted a life size allegorical portrait as a posthumous tribute and was so delighted with it that he then painted a smaller version (39 by 31 ins) the one acquired by the portrait gallery.

The painting was taken to France in the Civil War and is recorded in the 1660s in collection of Cardinal Mazaria, It then disappeared until a painting of similar dimensions and subject, presumably the same, appeared at Christie's in Science report

Animal 'magnetic compass' found

By Pearce Wright, Science Editor

The ability of migratory birdsto navigate thousands of miles, often on routes between the northern and southern hemispheres, has intrigued people for decades.

Evidence has been growing to suggest that those avian species which migrate over vast distances have a tiny magnetic compass to guide them. Support for the idea of such an inbuilt inertial navieation system has come from research showing that birds are not the only species to rely on the magnetic field of the Earth.

Fish also depend on the variations of the magnetic field to travel particular routes.

Moreover the navigation signals used by one aquatic family, the Yellowsin tuna called Thunnus albacares, are obtained from microscopic crystals of magnetite (the natural black oxide of iron, with formula Fe<sub>3</sub>O<sub>4</sub>) in tissue in the skull of the fish. The discovery of the magnetite crystals is reported in Science, the weekly periodical of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, by Michael Walker, of the University of Hawaii, Joseph Kirschvink and Shin-Bin Chang, of the California Institute of Technology, and Andrew Dizon, of the National Marine Fisheries Service at La Jolla, California.

Subsequent work has also revealed similar crystals in

However, the main study of tuna followed research show-ing it was possible to repro-duce conditioned responses to earth-strength magnetic fields in Thunnus albacares. The detection, extraction and classification of the magnetically susceptible mineral was achieved by an intricate procedure outlined in their report. But the crystals have a shape which is unique to biochemically formed magnet-

The relatively high concentration of magnetite in a small cavity within the bone of the skull has helped in locating a sense organ for which other scientists have been searching. In describing their results the zoologists say: "Even in the homing pigeon and honey bee, detailed localization of magnetite has proved difficult to ascertain, and the particles have not been isolated or characterized previously". Source: Science. May 18, Vol 224. No 4650, 1984.

Stock Exchange sees virtue in compromise

As the Stock Exchange Council wheeled out its chairman Sir Nicolas Goodison, last night, to meet the second of three alphabetically-split groups of brokers to discuss the future shape of trading its members can have had no lingering illusions that the independent businessmen who make up the Stock Exchange's membership might be prepared to leave it all to their representatives.

The council has had more than 300 replies to its Green Paper proposals. The rebel small stockbrokers seem finally to have mustered enough candidates to make a contest of the forthcoming council elections. And, most interesting of all, those who are unhappy about a simple abandonment of the split between brokers and jobbers now seem to have progressed beyond mere Luddite objection to change, to a genuinely positive response.

The pressure to make London dealing competitive with other centres was almost bound to make brokers deal on the same net basis as their large scale foreign market-making counterparts. The stockjobbers soon perceived that they could spread their dealing expertise and financing overheads by dealing direct with customers.

Instead of outright opposition to the inevitable, therefore, the doubters are instead moving to a compromise position/ beyond, but consistent with, the options, laid out by the council. This is to divide the Exchange's equity dealing into two tiers (or three if you count the Unlisted Securities Market).

This two-tier option, hinted at in the Governor of the Bank of England's speech at Liverpool a fortnight ago and firstifully explored in this column, would allow dual capacity for the top shares which are of main interest to international and institutional trading - at least the components of the FTSE 100 share index while maintaining the present split between broking and dealing for the bulk of second and third line stocks.

This is not, as might at first appear, just a second-rate British compromise that emasculates the effects of change. Its virtue is that it applies the main advantage of single capacity trading, which is the protection of investors who want to buy or sell at the best price, to the sectors of the market where that protection is most

It is clear that, with dual capacity, such protection can only be afforded by full information of the prices of deals through an American-style tickertape. Yet the lending firms seem reluctant to submit to the full rigours of instant information. In the big share markets, competition between market-makers itself provides some protection. In the smaller shares, does not.

This virture could be greater than the administrative perils of a two-tier marker.

Guinness pays dearly / for goodness

The new corporate team at Arthur Guinness & Son, the merchant bank Morgan Grenfell and the stock broker Wood Mackenzie look as though they will fall foul of an unsettled stock market in their first big deal for the Irish Brewing group - underwriting the agreed £47m cash and shares bid for Martin the Guinness is offering four of its shares and 450p in cash for every three Martin shares. But the price of Guinness shares has dropped away so dramatically because of a combination of falling markets and some harsh criticism over the price of the deal since the bid was made two and a half weeks ago, that the case for accepting Morgan Grendell's cash alternative bid now looks overwhelming. Guinness shares stand at 145 yin the market but need to be 150p before the share offer is worth considering. The first closing date is a week tomonidw.

Unless there is a sharp recovery in the price. Morgan will have to wield the underwriter stick leaving 17.6 million unwanted furness shares floating around the market and depressing the price for months into the future.

This in turn could cause havoc, in the short term at least, with the plans of chief executive. Mr Ernest Saunders, to make important strategic acquisitions in the British and American drinks trade.

Guinness is without doubt paying a high price for Martin but it was the price needed to see off the main rival, W H Smith, and the many others like Imperial Group which were reported to be lurking in the wings. It has also been through the Martin figures time and time again with the help of a team of management consultants and believes it can achieve with the 490 outlet company what it did with its existing 130 strong Lavells chain of confectioners tobacconists and news-

Lavells achieves a profit margin of about 6 per cent, while Martin's return on sales is still languishing at below 3 per cent. The potential for improvement by curting administrative expenses alone is significant, while more adventurous merchandising and display could provide a big boost to sales per customer.

Mr Saunders has proved himself a ruthless surgeon during the retrenchment period at Guinness. It looks as if he may have to embark on he expansion phase with the burden of a cash penalty through the vagaries of the stock market.

Long holiday for a depleted Neddy

In the absence of the TUC, it is left to the Confederation of British Industry to play opposition to the Government at the regular meetings of the National Economic Development Council. But sometimes the roles are even more bizarrely reversed.

Yesterday, for example, Mr Tom King, the Secretary of State for Employment was at Neddy before going off to Brussels where EEC ministers will be discussing ways of discussing the working week. Mrs atcher has made plain her disapproval of the German trade unions' campaign for a 35-hour week. However, as good Europeans, government ministers are always prepared to discuss anything on the agenda, and Mr King was no exception.

The TUC would naturally have been in favour of a shorter week, which it sees as a way of creating more jobs. But the CBI has no illusions: we cannot its representatives at Neddy argued forcefully, have Britain working part-time while Japan works full-Neddy, meanwhile, has voted itself a long summer holiday, with no meetings in July or August. By September 26, the first date set for the autumn, and a meeting traditionally chaired by the Prime Minister, the TUC will have met and discussed the Neddy boycoit. The TUC will also have elected a new general secretary, and Neddy is anxious to see him take his place. According to Mr John Cassels. Neddy's director general, "The Council is a tripartite body and one of our parties is missing. The office is run for its three shareholders, and this does not mean the TUC are not shareholders.

Recovery in Germany falters

Doubts over the strength of the economic recovery in West Germany grew yesterday with figures showing the second successive monthly fall in the index of orders for manufactur-

Gearing is still high at 70 per cent and the group must take steps to reduce this. JFB must be grateful that at least Forgemasters is not a drain on its precious cash flow, It should also begin to see the benefits of another joint venture which linked its aluminium and copper interests with those of BICC.

Progress to date has been better than expected and it should record a profit at the year end. This will be wiped out by the inevitable rationalization costs which have been incurred, but in 1984/85 it will be a valuable contributor to profits for JFB.

The share price was un-changed at 16p yesterday. A lot of repair work is still needed on JFB's reserves, but for the patient and the bold it is an interesting recovery stock.

Sarah Hogg and Peter Wilson-Smith act as guides to the tenth annual economic summit

Issues that matter to the people at the top

statesmen and bag-carriers assemble at London for the annual economic summit. The following brief guide is intended to help you through the pomp and persiflage: 1. How we got there

This is the tenth in a series of summits that began in 1975, the depth of the post-oil-shock recession. Since then the seven members of the summit club the United States, Japan, West Germany, France, Britain, Italy and Canada - have taken turns to play host. There has been an increasing tendency to choose picturesque locations outside the capital cities - eg. Venice (1980) or Versailles (1982) - as the summit has become more and more of a media event. President Reagan held last year's summit in the reconstructed colonial glories of Williamsburg Mrs Thatcher, in sublime disregard of the traffic problems, is exploiting unreconstructed London, as Mr James Callaghan did in 1977. 2. Who's who

The heads of government of the seven summit countries are attending, flanked by foreign and finance ministers. Italy and economies represented, set the limits of experience. It is Signor Bettic: Craxi's first summit and M Pierre Trudeau's seventh and last. It may, of course, be the last call for President Reagan or Prime Minister Nakasone: both the American president and the Japanese prime minister face re-election or re-selection before the end of

There is an eighth, slightly shadowy member of the summit club: the President of the European Commission, M Gaston Thorn. All four leding EEC governments are members in their own right, so M Thorn has a halfrole representing the rest.

The least visible but most vital guests are the summit "sherpas" - officials responsible for the pre-summit nego-tiations, including the drafting of the communique. Britain's chief sherpa is Sir Robert Armstrong, head of the Cabinet Office and the Civil Service. 3. The extras

About 1,000 officials will be attending, and about 3,000 journalists. Providing for this cast-list helps bring the bill for the summit, met by the British Government, to about £2.5m. This covers the elaborate security for heads of state, providing and equipping the Connaught Rooms with closed-circuit TV, 24-hour refresh-for the media. But "Food from Britain", a company set up last year to promote native deli-cacies, is helping feed journal-ists, the Royal Mint is stamping a special summit medal and, to help keep costs down, a number of British companies (eg British Telecom, BL) are providing free or cut-price services. Burton is even providing a special sum-

4. Scene changes The main summit talks tomorrow and Saturday take place in Lancaster House, Foreign ministers have been allotted the state drawing room, finance ministers the Long Gallery (for target practice?), the heads of government will meet in the Music Room (which Mrs Thatcher hopes will induce harmony).

The summit communique is supposed to be ready for reading out in Guildhall by 4pm on Saturday, in time for a wash and brush up before dinner at Buckingham Palace. between, the summitteers will be doing a good deal more dashing round town, adding to the security headache and the traffic. Between them, the prime and other ministers will be received or dined at a formidable array of British institutions, including the Kensington Palace Gardens Orangery, St James's Palace, No 10 Downing Street, the National Portrait Gallery, the Royal Society of Arts and the Bank of

5. Security headaches thought much of British security ever since the little episode of the Queen's bedroom visitor. So there has been particular difficulty about the arrangements for protection of President Reagan. For the first time it is being publicly admitted that some of his bodyguards will be carrying arms. 6. The topics

In between, or through the junketing, the heads of governmnt have an "informal" agenda to get through. Econ-omics is strictly the business of the summit, with political issues reserved for meal-times. Before, after or during the summit, Mrs Thatcher will be having "bilateral" meesings with all the visiting leaders; President Reagan has already been here most of the week, and Prime Minister Nakasone is staving on when the others go home. And the visitors will all be playing partners with each

In theory the political agenda for this summit is short and uncontentions. The heads of government will give them-

• Relations with the Soviet Union. President Reagan has already made his plea to the Soviet Union to return to the arms negotiation table. Prime Minister Nakasone has echoed it. The Japanese are likely to be pressed on their contribution to the defence burden borne by other summit countries. But the long-running dispute between the United States and other governments on trade with the Soviet Union and its satellites seems to have simmered down

• The Gulf War. No very profound conclusions are expected on how to end it, contain or simply minimize the damage to summit countries. The Japanese have been pressing for new oil-sharing arrangements, but these have largely been put in place undr the aegis of the International Energy Agency.

International terrorism. Mrs Thatcher is particularly keen to have this discussed, after international negotiations at ministerial level.

 Central America. Again,
 Mrs Thatcher was keen to stress British interests at her presummit briefing. But the topic is of rather less interest to the other summitteers than to the selves mild indigestion discus- British, Americans - and hoped to keep debt off the

7. The economic agenda Broadly, six issues have been on the sherpas' memo pads: • The recovery. This summit was originally planned as a confidence-booster, a re-affirmation of existing policies and the need to keep a downward pressure on inflation. Economic growth, at about 4 per cent for the world economy as a whole, has been accelerating for the past two years andthis summit was intended to celebrate its improvement. Since this original game-plan, however, other issues have rather forced their Interest rates. European governments have become increasingly sharp-tongued about the level of American interest rates. Chancellor Helmut Khol said this week that we will emphatically point out to American friends their responsibility for the level of world interest rates. The British Government has made it clear will be asking President Reagan for a "statement of intent" on further reduction in the American federal budget

International debt. This, obveously, is linked with the problem of interest rates. The American Government had agenda, but without success. resident Mitterrand sees it as his particular role to speak out for the developing countries. though he has a challenger, from a rather more conservative perspective, in Prime Minister Nakasone. President Mitterrand says he will be pressing for a "new global dialogue". Prim Minister Nakasone echoes his British and German colleagues in complan-

 Structural change. This is partly the result of an initiative taken at the Versailles summit. which set up a working group on technology and employment, whose report will formally be presented to this summit. But the issue also reflects American criticism of European economies, which are seen as suffering from "Euroclerosis" - a kind of hardening of the arteries of industrial development.

ing about American interest

 Exchange rates. This, again, is a follow-up to a summit initiative. President Mitterrand has been particularly critical of the way the system of floating exchange rates is working the rest, excluding the Americans, are less worried about the general issue, but do not like the behaviour of the dollar. After Williamsburg, a working party exactly what to say.

eral surveillance" by the International Monetary Fund of exchange rate policies. It has already reported to the May meeting of the Group of 10 industrial nations and a similar report will be presented to the summit. The work goes on, but dramatic conclusions for or against floating rates.

Trade. One of the stranges continuing features of summit discussions has been the annual commitment to resist - this vear's buzz-word = "roll-back" protectionism. The Americans, backed by the Japanese, are calling for a new round of trade negotiations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. The British do not mind. but have been stressing the need to accelerate existing Gatt work programmes and bring forward tariff reductions agreed under the previous Tokyo round. The French are opposed to a new Gatt round, from which they do not expect to gain much. 8 The results

The draft communique is said to be short and "workmanlike". Essential preplanned ingredients include a passage on the pursuit of non-inflationary growth and another on structural adjustment. On more contentions issues:

● No formal "statement of intention" on deficit reduction by the Americans, but some impersonal phraseology on the need for budgetary control and the necessity for reducing interest rates.

 With suitable caveats about timing and content (will services be included, for example?), a pledge to prepare plans for a new Gatt round will Reconfirmation of the "case by case" approach to inter-national debt negotiations; there is no general support for new institutional solutions such interest-rate "capping".

At the political end of the list, international terrorism will feature (though not, probably, in a separate declaration of

9. The wild card

But the Iran-Iraq war could still overturn the Sherpas, best-laid platitudes on the Gulf war is most vulnerable to abrasive world events. And the neat demarcation of issues for discussion is not proof against sudden change in the summiteers' real concerns. The essence "informal conversation", after all, is that not even the sherpas can tell their leaders

Last year's drought in West Africa was chiefly to blame. Speculative interest was further aroused by the possibility of frost in Brazil damaging the 1984/5 crop. It is five years since the last serious damage caused by frost in Brazil. One dealer said: "The gamble is on the frost. If there is frost it's Moreover, bring-ing forward exports can only intensify the shortage later on in the year, regardless of whether the frost does strike.

The price squeeze has led some analysts to argue that producer and consumer stocks are lower than had been thought. But the producers will want to inflate both their stock and exports figures because next

Yule Catto raises bid for paints group

By Jeremy Warner

Yule Catto has raised its takeover bid for Donald Macpherson, the Cover Pins paints group, to £24.7m, topping a rival bid - which had won the backing of Macpherson direc-tors - from the Finnish paints company Tikkurila

Yule Catto, a plantations, building products and chemicals group, once had the approval of Marpherson for its takeover advances but that was before the Finnish bid and there was no immediate response to the new terms yesterday.

Mr Rex Chester, chairman of Macpherson, was impressed by the way the Finnish company operates in the paints industry and its plans for Marpherson and the may feel there is more logic in a merger with Tikkurila

The new terms are 34 ordinary shares and 40 preference shares plus £15 in cash for every 100 Macpherson shares.

On the stock market, Macpherson shares rose 6p to 132p - 4p below the value placed on them by the new bid.
This is a new bid to be made in the 12-week-old battle for control of Marpherson, one of the few independent paint companies left in Britain. The battle began with an unwanted £13.6m bid from the Swedish paints company AB With Becker, Macpherson found a white knight in the form of Yule Catto but its bid of £22m was topped by an all-cash offer from Tukkurila

Justifying the improved terms 'yesterday, Yule Catto said that although no formal public forecast of Macpherson profits for the year to the end of next October had been made, it understood that Macpherson year's export quotes will be would be recording not less based on them.

Regina v Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex parte Shafeena Bi

Before Sir John Donaldson, Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Slade and Lord Justice Parker [Judgment delivered May 24]

Where a Muslim Pakistani national pronounced talaq in England and then notified his wife and the Chairman of the Union Council in Pakistan, thereby effecting a divorce recognized by Pakistani law, that divorce would not be recognized in English law under the provisions of the Recognition of Divorces and Legal Separations Act 1971.

The Court of Appeal so stated in dismissing appeals by the applicants, Chulam Fatima and Shafeena Bi from the decisions of Mr Justice Taylor. In each case the applicants had sought leave to enter the United had sought leave to enter the United Kingdom as the fiancee of her sponsor, a UK resident of Pakistani nationality. Each sponsor, a Muslim, had purportedly dissolved his previous marriage to his Pakistani wife by pronouncing a talaq against her in England, making a statutory declaration before an English solicitor that he had done so and then sending a copy of that document to the wife and the Chairman of the relevant union council in Pakistan.

Chairman of the relevant union council in Pakistan.

In each case, the immigration officer, not being satisfied that the marriage had been effectively dissolved according to English law, was not satisfied that the intended marriage between the applicant and her sponsor could take place within, a reasonable time and refused entry.

Each applicant sought judicial review of the immigration officer's decision. The judge had held that in each case the talaq divorce was by English law ineffective to dissolve the sponsor's first marriage.

English law ineffective to dissolve the sponsor's first marriage.

The 1971 Act provides under section 2: "Sections 3 to 5 of this Act shall have effect... as respects the recognition in Great Britain of the validity of overseas divorces... which—that is to say divorces... which—and country outside the British Isles; and (b) are effective under the law of and (b) are effective under the law of that country."

Section 3 (1) provides: "The validity of an overseas divorce or legal separation shall be recognized if, at the date of the institution of If, at the date of the institution of the proceedings in the country in which it was obtained — (a) either spouse was habitually resident in that country; or (b) either spouse was a national of that country. LORD JUSTICE SLADE, delivering the judgment of the court, said the Pakistani talaq divorces of the two sponsors satisfied those nition in the UK set out in sections?

(b) and 3(1)(b).

The issue was whether they also satisfied the further condition set out in section 2 (a). The issue made it necessary to answer two

I Did the relevant "proceedings" y means of which the divorces ere obtained take place wholly in Pakistan as the applicants con-

2 If the relevant "proceedings" took place partly in England and partly in Pakistan, were the divorces capable of satisfying the conditions

Considering the first question: In Quant Quant (1980) AC 744) the House of Lords held that the words

"other proceedings" in section 2 (a) of the 1971 Act were not to be limited to quasi-judicial proceedings, which were officially recognized in the country in which they were taken.

Once one accepted, as the House of Lords had held, that the phrase "other proceedings" in section 2 (b) was: not 'imited to quasi-judicial proceedings, it was difficult to see how one could properly isolate the first essential step in the chain of events that had to take place before a talaq divorce was effective under Pakistani law (that is, the pronouncement of the talaq) from the other steps and say that it did not other steps and say that it did not itself form part of the "relevant proceedings".

In the present cases, the prosouncement of the talaq was itself the institution of the proceedings which were officially recognized in Pakistan as lending to the relevant divorce.

In the court's judgment, the judge was right in deciding, as he did, that the pronouncement itself formed part of the relevant "proceedings" for the purpose of section 2 and that there proceedings took place party. those proceedings took place partly in England and partly in Pakistan. As to the second question: the two divorces in the present cases had been aptly described in the course of argument as "trans-occupied - accommodation as a licensee without exclusive pos-session and had been told by the owner to leave those premises had deliberately left that accommo-dation unless it had been found as a fact that the licence had been terminated: moreover, it was wrong for the authority to conclude that that person could, in those circumstances, continue in occupation as a lesspasser until physically kicked out or a court order was made for his removal. R r Ponsmouth City Council, Ex pune Knight and Another (The Times, July 18, 1983) was indistinguishable from the present case.

Mr Justice Hodgson so held in the Queen's Beach Division on May 21 allowing an application for judicial review by Pak Yau Li of a decision of the local authority on February 16. 1984, which refused his application under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 on the ground that he was intentionally homeless and remitting the matter to the authority for reconsideration.

not been obtained either by means of proceedings which took place exclusively outside the United Kingdom or by means of proceedings which took place exclusively within the United Kingdom.

The only authority to which the court had been referred in which the applicability of sections 2 and 3 to a trans-national divorce had been considered was the decision of the Divisional Court in R v Registrate General. Exparte Minhas ([1977] QB 1.) QB 1.) OB!.)
In that case, it was held that a talaq divorce obtained by a Pakistani, who had written the initiating notice of talaq in the UK, could not be recognized under section 3, since it was not obtained in proceedings outside the British section 3, since it was not obtained "in proceedings outside the British Isles" as required by section 2.

However, despite the close similarity on its facts, Mr Simon Brown, though submitting that it was correctly decided, felt able to place little or no reliance on that decision. For, as Lord Fraser pointed out in Quazi v Quazi at p $16 that decision was evidently based on a misunderstanding of the effect of the Muslim Family Laws Ordinance of 1961, And that misunderstanding clearly coloured the whole of the Divisional Court's conclusion.

Effectively, therefore, the court had to answer the second question without the benefit of any authority, save the careful and lucid judgment of the judge in the court below.

The court accepted that the words of section 2 (a), if read in isolation, of section 2 (a), if read in isolation, were capable of more than one construction. But they had to be read in the whole of the context.

The wording of sections 2 and 3 (1) when read together, in the court's judgment, made it clear that in using the phrase "judicial or other proceedings", in the course of its definition of an "oversead divorce", the legislature contemplated (a) one set of proceedings only; (b) a set of proceedings which had been instituted in the same country as that in which the relevant divorce was ultimately obtained.

On any other footing the phrase "at the date of the institution of the proceedings in the country in which it was obtained" in section 3 (1) would be inept. That phrase in its context manifestly referred to roccedings of any nature men-ioned in section 2 (a), whether of a judicial or other nature

It followed that, in the court's judgment, the judge was right in deciding that the requirement in section 2 (a), that the overseas divorce must have been obtained by means of proceedings in a country outside the British Isles, meant that the entirety of the relevant "proceedings", whatever they might have been, must have taken place in

in the present cases, the entirety of the relevant "proceedings" did not take place in Pakistan because the pronouncement of the taken which instituted the proceedings took place in the UK. The divorces accordingly were not, in the court's within the definition contained in section 2 (a).

Furthermore, the condition specified in section 3 (1) was incapable of fulfilment in either case, since there was no such date as "the date of the institution of the proceedings in the country in which the divorce was obtained.

Distinct."

Lord Diplock in Quazi v Quazi at p804 pointed out that the purpose of the recognition Act was to enable the United Kingdom to give effect in its domestic law to the Hague on its domestic law to the Hague Convention on the Recognition of Divorces and Legal Separations of 1970. He described the mischief which the convention was designed to cure as that of "limping marriages", that is to say "marriages that were recognized in some jurisdictions as having been validly dissolved, but in other jurisdictions.

dissolved, but in other jurisdictions still subsisting." Mr Kadri strongly urged that the court should not by its decision in these cases leave the two sponsors with "limping marriages" which were recognized in Pakistan, but not in the 'UK, as having been directly the control of the transfer of dissolved.

The court had some sympathy with that submission. Nevertheless the court was far from certain that it the court was far from certain that it would be the policy of the legislature to encourage the obtaining of "divorces by post" by Pakistani nationals resident in the UK by means of the talag procedure.

The court could therefore see no obvious reasons of legislative policy sufficient to justify giving section 2 (a) of the recognition Act a meaning other than that which the wording of the subsection in its context of the subsection in its context of the subsection in its context appeared to require.

The court upheld, with the judge, that the Pakistani talaq divorces of the two sponsors did not satisfy the conditions of section 2 (a) and that the immigration officer was in each case entitled to take the view that he could not be satisfied that the proposed marriages would take place within a reasonable time.

Where justices had erroneously held there was no case to answer, they had a discretion, where their clerk had not taken a note of evidence, when the case was remitted to them, to rehear the prosecution evidence and defence cross-examination, the Queen's Beach Divisional Court held on May 22. The court allowed the prosecutor's appeal by way of case stated and remitted the matter to the same bench of Lancaster Justices

Rugby Union: England's scrum half is key for second international Leap-frogging to fame on the veld

There is an old-fashioned air about England's new scrum half. Richard Hill has close-cropped ginger hair and a rollup-your-sleeves, no-nonsense attitude which characterized another England scrum-half, who also made his first international appearance in South Africa,

Hill, who was 23 in May, won his first cap against South Africa on Saturday, after making his way through rugby's first class ranks in quick time. It was only in April, 1983 that he was invited to join Bath for whom he played all of last season, rather than represent Exeter University, where he was in the fourth year of a physical education course.

He has come from behind Steve Smith Nigel Meiville, Nick Youngs and Richard Harding. Injuries to Smith and Melville may have smoothed his path, but be gives the impression that, having established himself, he will not be displaced lightly. He has come from behind Steve Smith, Nigel Meiville, Nick Youngs and Richard Harding Insurant to Smith and Moleille. Harding. Injuries to Smith and Melville may have smoothed his path, but he gives the impression that, having established himself, he will not be displaced lightly. He has a capacity for hard work which is the envy and despair of many of his England colleagues.

Concentrates on priorities

He welcomes the responsibility that the pivotal position of scrum half requires. After captaining his university and various England representative student sides, he found when he joined Bath that his prime function was to feed John Horton, the international stand-off half who would take the play-making decisions. That, too, has changed. Bath have recognized and encouraged his vision for the game.

"For a scrum half, the pass is the most important thing and the ability to break the next most important", Hill says with decision. He has worked on his spinting but has tended to neglect his kicking, not correasonably, since in the limited time he has available he prefers to concentrate on his two main priorities, leaving the kicking to Horton who does it so well. Even so, training at Ellis Park, he was filling in the spare time by lofting high balls to Nick Stringer.

"It seemed to me that the way to catch people's eyes was to develop my pass. In my last year at school I started to go into the gymnasium and practice for an hour regularly. I chalked a square against a crash mat and if I got a certain percentage of 15 balls on the mark I would go back a foot and start again".

Hill was born in Birmingham but his family moved south when he was seven, to an area which is bardly a hot-bed of rogby. He went to the Bishop of Wandsworth Grammer School in Salisbury. His international cap is the first to be won by a pupil, his school or by the local Salisbury club for whom he played during his first year at university.

He only played in England's senior trial in January this year because Smith, the British Lion, dropped out. He made a good impression and became the replacement for the international championship until a hamstring injury sustained in his chub's John Player Cup quarter-final against Wasps ruled him out of the England squad against Wales. Harding became deputy to Youngs and a contender for the present

Man for big occasion

Hill returned in time to help Bath to win the John Player Cup and the selectors opted for his youthful promise and ebullience rather than Harding with his decade of experience for Cambridge University, Moseley, Bristol and Glouces-tershire. Their confidence has been repaid as Hill, thriving on the hard grounds, has leap-frogged over Youngs, capped in six

He is one of those fortunate players who give no indication of suffering from nerves on the big occasion. "The bigger the crowd the more I enjoy it. I do get nervous - I would worry about it if I didn't - but I love playing in front of a big crowd when there

He has also enjoyed playing behind these touring England forwards. "Having watched England for so many years when the forwards appeared to be lacking dynamism I expected us to win little ball. But our forwards have been brilliant, especially in the rucking. The ball comes back on the floor as though on a plate and it leaves you so many options."

Unfortunately, that was not the case in bis first international, but in difficult circumstances Hill played as well as anyone. His basic attributes, courage and a: quick pair of hands, served him well. He may not be the most natural footballer to occupy the position but it is his now; someone else will have to work very hard

Fierce hitting by Garth le Rouz, who struck three sixes and made 50 from 33 balls, maintained the tension to the end of this Benson and Hedges Cup tie as Yorkshire reached the semi-finals for the first time for five years. Le Roux was mainly responsible for taking Sussex, who needed 261, far closer to victory than seemed likely at one P Carrick, G. B Stevenson, S. D Fletcher and S. Oldham did not bet. from a masterful innings by Moxon. It seemed Sussex might get back into the game in a brief passage following his dismissal. Hartley, however, led a spirited closing assault in which 104 came from the final 10 overs. Sussex must have rued the gamble they took with Pigott, who managed only five overs before retiring with a strained back. Boycott soon exchanged his Boycott soon exchanged his helmet for a cap, an indication the pitch was easy-paced, but Waller beat him with a quicker ball at 65. Movon on-drove the spinner for a huge six and all sorts of possibilities seemed within his reach but immediately after lunch he was beaten by le Roux as he moved out

Bairstow promoted himself but Barrstow promoted himself but was soon caught at long-on. Sharp, who had played some attractive strokes, was run out after good work by Waller and Gould. Yorkshire managed only 19 runs in eight overs at these three wickets fell, but Hartley, ably helped by Love and Sidebuttom the aut leave. Sidebottom, then cut loose:

ARUNDEL: West Indians beat once more had responsibility for Duchess of Norfolk's XI by 64 runs.

It is becoming easier to under-stand why West Indies unceremo-niously omitted Roberts and Daniel from their touring party. After 12 overs of Walsh and Small, their successors, the Duchess of Norfolk's XI's score stood, or rather tottered, at 29 for six. Not surprisingly, her ide, which was by no means weak, failed to recover.

It should, no doubt, have been a relaxed occasion, a match of what used to be called country house cricket. That is not to denigrate it. for it played an important part in the development of the game. But for Walsh and Small and others. there can be no relaxation, these days, Competition for Test places is

So West Indies gave it their all. They were belped, it must be said, by some poor batting by the Duchess's side.

England's potent exile bides his time

Another England squad is announced, and once again we sigh, and start counting on our fingers and work out how long it is we have to go. The answer is: until April, 1985.

And we remember, when that infamous list was first published, that list if our brave lads who went to foreign lands to play under the the much as I thought I would. Perhaps that go of the South African Breweries that is wrong. But I am playing from day to day quite happily.

It has been less hanny for the Company, how we scanned the names, registered that most of them, fine cricketers that they were, were palyers a little way on to the wrong side of the hill, sighed with relief that Botham and Gower were not among them, and then turned to one name and said: Oh. TENNIS: A JOYOUS DRAMA IN PARIS AND DISGRACEFUL INCIDENTS IN MANCHESTER

Shaw is the first Briton to be disqualified

Stephen Shaw became the first British player to be disqualified from a major tenais tournament yesterday. The 21-year-old Middlesex player earned that unwanted distinction at the Manchester distinction at the Manchester tournament, sponsored by GMC, at Didsbury yesterday, after being involved in incidents described by the referee, Bea Seal, as "the most disgraceful I have ever seen."

Shaw ranked 12th in Britain, finished his third round match with Nick Fulwood of Derbyshire, which he lost 7-6, 6-0, with Mrs Seal watching after he had three times thrown his raccount away. His watering after he had three times thrown his racquet away. His actions had brought him to within a point of disqualification, and afterwards he admitted he didn't try in the second set, during which he served seven successive double faults, and at the end threw his recome into a paichbearing server. lakins, and at the end threw has racquet into a neighbouring garden. Mirs Seal promptly defaulted him from the rest of the toursament. A top official for 20 years, she said: "What he did was completely derugatory to tennis, to the tournament, and to the chib."

Shaw claimed his behaviour was triggered by a bad call from the umpire, John Southworth, early in the opening set. "I am ashamed at my behaviour" he said. John Fitzgerald, the Australian

No. 4 seed, missed a match point and was knocked out in the second round of the Beckenham tournament, sponsored by the Kentisk Times, yesterday. He was beaten 6-1, 3-6, 7-6 by his fellow countryman Craic Miller.

Wilander triumphant in dazzling splendour

The French championships had always been interesting enough to make some dull weather well worth make some dull weather well worth tolerating Yesterday, they warmed up in both senses when Matts Wilander beat Yannick Noah, 7-6, 2-6, 3-6, 6-3, 6-3, thus reversing the result of last year's final in a match of dazzling splendour. It spanned three hours and 35 minutes of a lovely afternoon, and was always a compelling spectacle,

Two years ago Wilander, now 19, became the youngest of all French singles champions, of either sea, He was runner-up in 1983 because Noah, who was tiring at the end, just had enough strength left to beat him in strengers but straight seat. The instrenuous, but straight sets. The same thing might have happened yesterday. But in the course of a thrilling first set that lasted 74 minutes, Noah spent more energy than he could afford = because he lost theset lost the set.

After 72 more minutes of straining sweating effort. Noah had won the second and thus sets. But won the second and thurs sets, But the type of game he plays – the only type of game that gives him a chance against Wilander – is awfully wearying. It demands leaping, lunging aerobatics in the forecourt. All that took its toll, At the end of the third set and the beginning of the fourth, Noah was afflicted by cramp and, though oiling and massaging his legs during changeovers, naturally expected that the cramp would get worse. There was fear in his eyes. Despair. He knew or thought he knew, that he was too tired to win another set.

But the cramp vanished, What extraordinary resources this superb

Wilander had broken his service in the first game. Again, Noah was grimacing, clenching his fist, shouting at himself, the man's intensity was frightening. He had the crowd on his side because they, too, were French. They willed him to dig ever more deeply into his obbing energy. And dig, he did Noah had two break points in the sixth game but could not win either.

When Noah was serving at 3-5 and 30-all he had to pause for a few moments. The wind had blown up a swirling cloud of shale. Noah did not need that. He had given his all. he was losing, he was feeling low and there was nothing left in him but courage and hope. He went match point down by over-hitting and approach shot. Then he was by a forehand return off a second service.

In spite of the sad reminder of human frailty, this was a joyous drama. The packed centre court glowed in bright heat. The russel court was a lonely, cruelly-demand-ing battleground. The inscrutably composed Wilander hit his grounds trokes to an exemplary length that gave Noah no uncarned chances to get to the net. But, somehow, Noah got there - and his reactions and reach were astonishing.

When Wilander Lobbed, Noah (until he tired) seemed to climb through the air as if on springs or some invisible ladder.

Speradically, they exchanged toles, with Wilander at the net and Neah trying to pass or lob him. For the most part, though, this was a ilashing duel between the baselin and the net player. They gave us the beauty of contrast. They gave us drops, lobs, angles - all the clay-court business. They gave us unremitting effort.

That left two heavyweights, Ivan Lendl and Andres Gomez, to slug away for the right to play Wilander in a semi-final. Lendl won the duel John McEnroe and Jimmy Connors will meet in the other. By Lewine Mair

Plenty of references are still being made to the LGU's decision to go into this week's Curtis Cup match at Muirfield with a side containing no players from north of the border. However, the remarks are now more mischievous than vicious, and even the LGU must have enjoyed the tale of how, when it was announced that there was to be a display of Scottish country dangers. someone asked if the dancing team would contain any Scots.
With the match due to start tomorrow, Diane Bailey, the Great Britain and ireland captain, is putting still more emphasis on her short game. Every time snyone takes three putts Mrs Bailey collects. 10p towards an as yet unnamed charity.

On Tuesday she made a pound, but in the squally showers of yesterday moraing she did rather better. Not that the Great Britain and Ireland side bave been scoring badly. campaign to war election to the Football League looks certain to end in a close result at the annual meeting of the League in Londor Maidstone will go to the polis with the bottom four clubs in the fourth division; Hartlepool United Halifax, Town. Rochdale and Chester City, and there seems every chance that they will become the first club to break into football's tightest closed shop since Wigan Athletic in 1978.

Last year Maidstone polled 26 votes, just 10 fewer than Hartlepool and a record for a club applying for election for the first time. Hartlepool again looked the most endangered club, for they are seeking re-election for the fourth time in eight years, and for the fourteenth time in their 63 years in good to know that the remarkable O'Brien magic has been transferred from father to son.

Yesterday's result also continued the fabulous success story of Northern Dancer, the most prepotent sire in the world. The 24-year-old stallion was siring his third Derby winner, and, is, of course, also the father of El Gran Señor.

Sectreto was bought by his Venezualan owner, Luigi Mig-litti, for $340,000 at Keeneland. even at that time, as recently a nomination to Northern Dancer Clauda Monet: "He was going David Elsworth, trainer of the third, Mighty Flutter, was over the moon. He said "This

No valid excuses were offered for any of the beaten horses. Guy Harwood said about Alphabtim: "Piggott said the colt was never going at any stage, and never game him any feel. It's hard to know what to make of it, as he would not have blown a candle out on his

Vintage Piggott on Adonijah

Lester Piggott's ageless genius has never been more apparent than when winning the Pacemaker Diomed Stakes on Adonijah for Henry Cecil at Epsom yesterday. All the tactical sense and figir that has brought the maestro 11 jockeys' championships and 26 classic victories had never been more apparent than in his patient handling of the 5-4 on favourite as the pair swept triumphantly past Lucky Scott entering the last furlong. Adonijah as now won two nattern races in the space of nine days for Prince Khaled Abdullah, having also captured the Brigadier Gerard Stakes at Sandown Park on Bank Holiday Monday.

"He's a high-class little borse,"

Cetil, said "but he must have decent going. He's in races like the Queen Anne Stakes, the Prince of Wales's and Eclipse. But he might have a test. I've also got Legend of France entered in those races, as well." Questioned about the termination of his four-year partnership with Piggott, Cecil said: "I'm very with Piggott, Cecil said: "I'm very said about it all. I've tried hard to get Daniel Wildenstein to change his mind. But for his own reasons, he's been adamant that Piggott will never ride for him again.

"I'm hoping that Steve Cauthen will be riding for me next season. He wants a change. Nothing has been

At a tidy, unpretentious house in a small town in the Brussels suburbs, steady summer rain patters on the flat transparent ceiling of the games-room extension where Herma Nys keeps his recommend. Herma Nys keeps his parrot and an old billiard table for an occasional game with his brother. The anniversary of D-Day brings recollections of his boyhood in the Belgian underground resistance.

Leaning up against the billiard table is a partly dismantled bicycle frame. Indeed, much of the room is taken up with the tools, trophies, knicknacks, the long row of old leader's vests on hangers like a tetaller's window, of the young man busy with a spanner adjusting the pedals. A gen-darme on the other side of town dame on the other side of town cannot tell you the name of the road, but instinctively knows of the house where "Mister Paris-Nice" is garishly painted by well-wishers on the driveway of the family with whom he has lodged for six years.

Ferocious

You can lift that bicycle with a little finger. It is Sean Kelly's new carbon-fibre frame, and he is adjusting measurement of handlebars, brakes and gears in preparation for the start of today's Tour of Luxembourg. That is followed by the Tour of Switzerland, and he will not Switzerland, and he will not return to this domestic oasis, where Herman's grandchildren joke with him in Flemish and French, and Grandma Elise devotedly grills his steaks, until after the most physically fer-ocious individual annual sport-

On a mountain climb such as Alpe d'Huez, where some 300,000 spectators will line the banks and rocks around the 100 hairpins, the riders are close to mental oblivion as they crest

Sean knows that ultimately everything comes down to the mental factor, the imponderable which separates all great athletes at the top of every sport. It is odd to hear Herman Nys talking in an English colloquia-lism, saying that "John now believes in himself". He is convinced Sean has been capable of overall victory in the Tour for two or three years - he was seventh last year - but that when the mountain stages arrived the Irishman, with his unrivalled sprinting qualities, would fade from the leading names because he became names because he became preoccupied with finishing the course instead of fighting to stay with the front riders. Now he is not overswed by the mountains, where on the downhill stretches they reach 60mph or more.

Reliable

"He has grown from boy to man", says M Nys, whose affinity with cycling in the British Isles came when he was stationed at Larne late in the war. "What Else and I are proud of is that Sean's word is known to be reliable, that he recognizes there's another life after cycling." Sean says he will definitely retire at home in Carrick when his racing is finished; his introspective image may to some extent limit his scope for valuable advertis-ing endorsements.

With M Nys's guidance, he has resolutely stayed off drugs, though rigorous testing on the Tour de France, with seven riders called in each day, has virtually eliminated abuse and even jeopardized normal medi-cal back-up by banning many proprietory cough mixtures and other chemists' non-prescribed supplies. You've fewer rights than the man in the street," Sean laughs.

His hair is greying already, the sharply boned nose looks as weatherbeated as a farmer's: he is the only one of three brothers who can proficiently milk his father's cows. Yes, he admits. he is riding even better this year, but everything depends on who comes to a peak in three

West Ham United and Birming-ham City have had their suspended FA Cup bans dismissed by an FA commission meeting in London

The two clubs had separate hearings at a Board of Appeal meeting at Lancaster Gate, appealing against the sentences passed by an FA Commission in Birmingham on March 7. The Commission was set up to investigate two pitch invasions and crowd disturbances at the clubs' fifth round FA Cup tie at St Andrew's on February 18, which Birmingham won 3-0.

St Andrews on Pebruary 18, which Birmingham won 3-0.

The Birmingham Commission found the home side guilty of failing to control their supporters. The three-man Board of Appeal yesterday heard evidence from the match cay neare evidence from the mater referee, George Courtney, the two linesmen, police, two independent witnesses and representatives of both clubs, eventually overturning the decision of the FA Commission after deliberating for five hours.

An FA spokesman said: "We are not prepared to divulge the reasons for the Commission decision being overturned. The board, comprising FA vice-chairman, Arthur McMullen, the chairman of the inter-national committee. # WE'RE LOOKING FOR ELECTRONICS ENGINEERS WHO ARE LOOKING FOR A CHALLENGE.

Although Heath Robinson may have been a little unorthodox in his approach to design problems, he undoubtedly demonstrated the enterprise and ingenuity so essential to our business.

The aerospace industry presents engineers with challenges unlikely to be found anywhere else. That's why these vacancies are for people who relish involvement in projects which will stretch their abilities to the limit.

We're extending the Design and Engineering facilities at our Bolton site. strengthening the links between product development and production, and opportunities for Electronic Engineers are now available in the following areas:-

NEW EQUIPMENT DESIGN

The need for practical solutions to an ever-increasing range of operational demands means that engineers are constantly involved in new and stimulating design projects. A typical current task is the development of interface systems to link aircraft and missile computer systems in flight.

MISSILE TEST EQUIPMENT

The development of advanced Automatic Test Equipment, which will subject today's highly intelligent missile systems to conditions which simulate the strict environmental problems they will face in use. These posts offer plenty of scope for software development.

POST-DESIGN SUPPORT

With operational requirements constantly changing, and technological advances always occuring, our postdesign support team ensure that products are updated and modified throughout their life span.

TODAY'S JOB OPPORTUNITY. TOMORROW'S CAREER

This expansion of our design engineering facility is a reflection of the growth we are currently experiencing. Existing projects alone will keep us occupied over the next decade, and there are more new developments in the pipeline. For engineers with an eye on the future as well as a good job opportunity today, these openings provide real opportunities to develop long-term careers.

LIVE AND WORK IN THE BEST OF ENVIRONMENTS

These positions are based at our Bolton site, located right next to a busy, modern town with every facility and surrounded by open countryside. Excellent motorway links provide easy access to beauty spots such as the Lake District. North Wales and the Fylde Coast, plus major connurbations such as Manchester.

Housing is relatively inexpensive and assistance with relocation will be provided where appropriate.

General Appointments

Managers for advanced research programmes In all areas of Computer Science Up to £35,000+substantial benefits

We are searching for a number of key scientific trail blazers to direct major research projects at the new Hewlett-Packard Research Centre, Bristol.

The Hewlett-Packard commitment to technical excellence is acknowledged in world markets. It has achieved a prominent position through the calibre of its research effort in Palo Alto. In 1983, the company spent $493m on R&D. representing 10.5% of sales revenue.

A further, and highly significant, example of Hewlett-Packard's commitment to the future, is the establishment of a new Research Centre in Bristol. The rationale for this development, centres on the recognition that in Europe, there are areas of particular expertise, which, if brought to bear, will significantly contribute to Hewlett-Packard's long term corporate product objectives.

Our immediate task is to recruit a number of managers, to drive specific project teams in the following areas:

- ★ Communication Networks/Data Coding and Encryption.
- * Artificial Intelligence/Expert
- Systems. ★ Software Engineering — developing tools and methodologies.

For these critical roles we are looking for people of very high calibre. They will be acknowledged experts in their field and have the management skills to lead talented teams creating some of the future generation of Hewlett-Packard products. Clearly we will be asking for high academic achievement, together with a record of creativity and implementation of design concepts, which has led to the successful introduction of products into the market place.

The managers appointed will establish close working relationships with their opposite numbers in Palo Alto, Universities and with Hewlett-Packard operating companies in Europe. Communications between Bristol and Palo Alto will be close through regular visits and the introduction of a teleconferencing facility. The Bristol Laboratory will conduct both unique and complementary research to its counterpart in Palo Alto. It will grow to a total of some 300 people by 1987.

If you would like to explore these opportunities further, send your curriculum vitae in confidence to Geoffrey King, Managing Director of Cambridge Recruitment Consultants, who is advising Hewlett-Packard on these appointments, which are open to both men and women.

Can you manage your job title?

Manager is one of the most abused words in the employment vocabulary. The term can be a courtesy title for senior operatives whose job requires no concern for the wider relevance of their work to the organization as a whole. Equally, it can describe someone who is responsible for all aspects of a complete enterprise.

The distinctions are usually wellunderstood within individual working cultures. But considerable confusion arises once boundaries are crossed. Applicants for a job in a new company would do well to make sure that their understanding of the term "manager" is shared by their prospec-tive employer and also that the status and other rewards match up to mutual expectations.

mutual expectations.

In its original sense "manager" described a person who carried responsibility for a task or function—the person in charge". This was subsequently corrupted to mean someone who only got other people to do things. In recruitment language this is expressed as "persuasive communication", "achieve objectives by the motivation of people" or "control and co-ordinate".

Lately there has been a return to the more democratic team leader or executive management concept where managers are responsible for ger ting their own output as well as that of subordinates. A recent advertisement for a general sales manager for a wine company, for instance, asks for someone to train, motivate and direct a national network of representatives while personally handling house accounts". In specialist areas the executive extension can create burdens in keeping pace with new developments while managing others. At the same time, at least in theory it has advantages in preventing managers from becoming too remote from

Many old job titles therefore can hide a multitude of new requirements which are not always advertised in the job specification. Micro-technology has already changed out of all recognition the requirements behind the title "production manager". While an earlier generation of office managers concentrated mainly on filing cabinets and stationery, their successors are wrestling with the full-blooded implications of electronic information systems. Any manager-thinking of returning to an earlier area of expertise after a gap of even a few years should check out any assump-tions and be prepared to take a refresher course before applying.

Another factor to investigate are the opportunities in areas which did not exist a few years ago. In the last 20 years, the service sector has overtaken manufacturing as the dominant area for employment. By the end of the century, services are expected to provide three out of every four jobs. Examples of new openings of managers culled from recent adver-tisements include building societies, plastic credit card producers, franchizing, casinos, insolvency, freeports and stockbroker services. These are in addition to predictable areas such as shops, hotels and hospitals.

Pioneers of the post-World War II management movement, like the late Mr Lydall Urwick, preached the necessity for managers to learn to lead rather than command. The pioneers believed that leadership could be taught, particularly if the process started early in life, say the mid-twenties C. Northcote Parkinson, originator of Parkinson's Law, identifies six basic requirements for leadership. These start with a clear picture of the final result and end with personal magnetism and visibility (leadership cannot be exerted from behind closed doors). Parkinson also adds that the rules do not change - merely that they have to be rediscovered by each generation.

While leadership has returned to prominence as a desirable quality in management, the modern feeling is that it is not enough by itself. Mr John Greeniaus, the 39-year-old Canadian who became chief executive of Nabisco Brands United Kingdom operations earlier this year, considers it equally important to be able to be "a good coach or just a very reliable

Before they get there, people think that everything focuses down in senior management. In fact, the reverse is true. "The number of constituent parts increases the further up the scale you go", he says. "Strong leadership alone is certainly not enough because, to quote the old adage, if your only tool is a hammer, then every problem becomes a nail".

More than 40 per cent of the active workforce are now

More than 40 per ceut of the active workforce are now women. Women spend more of their adult lives in employment than ever before and spend less time having families, and men still remain the 'basic' wage earners. These are the main conclusions of the most comprehensive government survey on women at work published since 1965. The survey, Women and Employment: a Lifetime Perspective by Jean Martin of the Office of Population, Censuses and Surveys and Cerdwen Roberts of the Department of Employment, was based on a nationally representative sample of 5,500 women; 800 bushends were also interviewed. husbands were also interviewed.

It found that the distribution of women workers was mainly confined to a few occupations, mostly in the services sector. Moreover 50 per cent worked a fall week (more than 31 hours) and the majority of those who worked part-time were employed for more than 16 hours a week (thereby entitling them to the same legal protection against unfair dismissal and compensation for redundancy against minar dismissal and compensation for redundancy as their full-time counterparts).

The survey concluded that while women remain the "primary houseworkers", "trend evidence suggests that more and more women will be attached to the labour market for most of their working lives." This did not, however, appear to have changed men's attitudes to their nowver, appear to have changed near a futures in their wives' employment. Only 43 per cent of the women interviewed said that their husbands were pleased they work, while 14 per cent said that their husbands would definitely prefer them not to work.

(Channel 4, 9.30 pm), Derek Banham's film that first surfaced at the London Film Festival last year, is a bit like the bee that lurks in the rose, that stings as you sloop to take in the perfume. When the sting comes in the film, it is very nasty indeed, which should not surprise you when you consider that this is an ian McEwan story, and Mr McEwan's characters inhabit a world where every second rose conceals a bee. And, indeed, the bees are heard buzzing happily away in the first seconds of Mr Jenny can cartwheel with joy as much as she likes at a country picnic, her young friend can warm to his surrogete mother as much as he wants, and the two of them can go rowing along the river to their hearts' content, but Mr McEwan is not going to let this idy! get out of hand. It is not for nothing that he has settled on the last Day of Summer as the title for his cruel and touching story, exquisitively photographed by Nic Knowland.

I have no qualins about adding a couple more: ninety-five per cent of it is to do with Mr Hale's finances and five per cent with his faith. The proportion seems about right, given that it is the revivalist's moneyraising activities and the disposition of that cash that has exposed him to so much villfication.

Parents are helping in the library or classroom, improving premises, supplying transport, and buying computers, games kit, books and musical instruments, in most schools.

The general conclusions, which do not identify individual authorities, are that 28 education authorities provided "less than satisfactory" re-sources in most aspects, while only 14 had "at least satisfactory" levels of resource in all main fields.

Although teacher numbers fell by 5.500 to 414,500 last year, pupils numbers also dropped by 200,000. Many schools and authorities are criticized for failing to redeploy staff efficiently to take account of falling rolls and the improvement in pupil-teacher ratios. Sir Keith Joseph, Secretary of State for Education and Science. said the report's "clear message" was that many authorities and schools were failing to grasp the opportunities to improve education offered by effective management.

He accepted however, the difficulties caused by population changes and spending constraints, and said that deterioration in buildings and poor maintenance and repair were "particularly worrying".

Mrs Nicky Harrison, who chairs the education committee of the Labour-controlled Association of Metropolitan Authorities, said the report showed that education was becoming more dependent on handouts from better-off parents.

Mr Giles Radice, Labour's chief education spokesman, said that although, according to the report the situation had slightly improved in schools the im-provement was "extremely

In another part of the vast theatre of operations, the feared White House press division was swarming ashore. Its mission: to destroy coverage of who-ever had won the California primary.

Meanwhile, many of us, in another reversal of the situation of 1944, preferred to invade Normandy via Paris. Once arrived, we discovered that the Americans were pressing ahead with their strategic aim of reclecting Mr Reagan, and the BBC with theirs of vanquishing TV-am. At Bayeux, a large number of Swedes rushed up the shore reenacting the invasion of 1944. Those of us with the knowledge of mid-twentieth century history dimly recalled that the Swedes were not combatants in 1944 nor indeed in most conflicts since the Thirty Years War. It emerged that an amateur military history society, which was reenacting the invasion. contained an inordinate number of Swedish members many Swedes apparently, being unprepared to resign themselves to being Mr Olof Palme or Mr Ingmar Berg-

Elsewhere in Normandy a certain ordered chaos reigned The French security closed off the roads to the British and all other foreigners. American security closed off the roads to all other foreigners including the French.

On the television screens of a hundred cases Mr Reagan and M Mitterand could be glimpsed orating magnificently. The Queen appeared on the cliffs at Arromanches. Thousands of visitors specially Americans, poured into the region under the misap-prenhension that they would be allowed to get anywhere near the beaches.

Outside the railway station at Caen three huge buses were on hand to take the world's press down to the beach to observe Mr Reagan. Various American ex-servicemen, their Sull chest heaving with medals, asked to be taken too. "Are you a journalist", a French official asked one of them. "Oh sure", the old soldier replied. "Gee swee fantous journaliste - nomme famous journauste - nomme Ernest Hemingway." The official was unconvinced. Who can say whether the old soldier saw again the beach he presumably last saw 40 years

The small towns which those men helped to liberate in 1944 now wore a glossier guise. In Bayeux, a women's hairdresser had a paratrooper's uniform hung in the window. Fast food joints offered D-Day hamburgers. Yet through it all a certain nobility emerged. At Pegasus Bridge, near Caen, where stands the first house in France to be liberated by the invading forces - British paratroopers as it happens - a rather amateur local band, at intervals, played God Save the Queen and the Marseillaise on wobbly trumpets. Britons in green berets wandered about assuring one another that it all was just as it was 40 years

The bridge was raised as the royal yacht Britannia slid past. We all cheered. The man whose job it is to raise the bridge assured me that, as a boy, he was there on that night, all those years ago. President Reagan and the Queen, as was to be expected comported themselves as the ceremonial heads of state they are. One of them admittedly, is also a politician trying to be reelected. But we all know that he most relishes and at which he is best. President Mitterrand as befitted a French intellectual spoke among other, things of reconciliation with Germany. M Pierre Trudeau, whose country suffered disproportio-nately on these beaches, was eloquent in two languages. As it was a day for the late middle-aged and the elderly, it was also a day for the young. Crowds of young people in the cases of the towns. For once, the uniform of T-shirt and jeans was not that of left wing protests. Instead, there seeme among the young the sense that they were present among survivors of events previously

The Daily Star, however, says that we now have proof that the that we now have proof that the Government was as much involved as the National Union of Miners and the National Coal Board. It adds: "There is nothing wrong with the Prime Minister planning tactics and issuing orders just as Arthur Scargil does for the NUM. What is wrong, is for a government to pretend that is is not doing so. Its very credibility is at stake."
